TO OUR READERS.

ON the completion of another Volume, a few words from the PROPRIETORS of the SPORTING MAGAZINE may not probably be deemed unneceſſary. The language of ſelf-praiſe is not what they wiſh to adopt. They promiſed to produce ſuch a Fund of inſtructive and amuſing Leſſons for the Sportſman, as had never before appeared; and the Letters of Thanks they have received from every corner of this and a Siſter Kingdom, are the beſt Proofs of their having ſucceeded.

Hunting, Racing, Shooting, Fiſhing, Cricketing, Cocking, Farriery, &c. &c. have been traced from their earlieſt Sources; and every Improvement or new light which has been thrown on theſe Subjects, by Men of acknowledged Abilities, the Proprietors have availed themſelves of. Singular Events that have occurred in the Sporting World, have been recorded as accurately as circumſtances would admit; and whenever an erroneous Statement has been made, their readineſs to ſet it right cannot but be allowed by every one.

Four Volumes of this Work are now compleated, throughout which it has been the Aim of the Proprietors to unite with the neceſſary Directions for the Sportſman, ſome humourous Tale to divert him after the fatigues of the Chace; and in doing this, care has been taken that it is in ſome degree analogous to his favourite Sport. Theſe Diſhes, (though not very great adepts in the Epicurean Art themſelves) the Proprietors truſt will ſuit the palate of the generality of their Readers; but ſhould there be among them, thoſe who are fond of higher ſeaſoned food, they will not (it is hoped)

"D——n the Dinner, and kick the Cooks;"

but good-naturedly furniſh them with the means for future improvement.

 Unwilling to ſacrifice any part of that room which is allotted to the Articles of their Correſpondents, the Proprietors have poſtponed their Acknowledgments to them ſeparately till their next; aſſuring them, however, generally, that ſuch of their Favours as have not yet appeared, ſhall have every attention paid them.

ARCHERY.

Meeting of the Royal Surrey Bowmen, at Epsom, with a beautiful Engraving from an Original Drawing.

THE ſplendid exhibition of rank and faſhion, at the meeting of the Royal Surrey Bowmen, held on Epſom Downs, on the 4th of laſt mouth, (particularly noticed in page 281 of our preſent Volume), has induced us, from a ſketch given by a gentleman who was one of the company, to get executed the drawing, from which the beautiful engraving, allotted as a frontiſpiece to our Fourth Volume, has been taken: how far we have ſucceeded in point of effect, we ſhall leave to thoſe perſons who were preſent to determine; for ourſelves, we only beg leave to add, that our accuſtomed attention has been uſed, and we truſt it will meet the approbation of our readers.

Although it has been a general rule, with us, to inſert the particulars of the meetings of the Societies of Archers, wherever they took place, in our Sporting Intelligence, in the preſent inſtance we ſhall deviate from it, and give the following, that have occurred ſince the publication of our laſt number, in this place; and the firſt that claims our attention is at Chadderton, in Lancaſhire, the ſeat of Sir Watts Horton, Bart. a moſt elegant gilt quiver and ſet of arrows, preſented by Lady Horton, to the ſociety of the Lancaſhire Bowmen, and the Broughton and Middleton Archers, was ſhot for at the four lengths, 16, 2, 8, and 4 roods, and won by Mr. Thackeray, of the Broughton

Archers,

Archers, by a great majority of casts. The meeting was most numerously and elegantly attended and the evening was concluded with the greatest festivity and harmony.

The Kentish Royal Bowmen also held their anniversary meeting, on Dartford Heath. The principal company were, Lord Eardley, Lord Say and Sele, Mr. Maddocks, the Rev. Mr. Wright, Dr. Leith, Mr. Pots, Mr. Dodd, Mr. Latham, &c. &c. — A very elegant repast followed the shooting. Venison was supplied by Mr. Jackson, of Fenchurch-street, to which was added every other delicacy of the season. At this meeting, near one hundred guineas were subscribed by the members for professional singers, and the overplus to be given to the Marine Society, for assisting the fatherless-children of sailors.

And lastly, the Woodmen of Arden shot for a silver arrow, on their Archery Ground, at Meriden, at nine-score yards, which was won by the Rev. John Dilke, of Maxtock Castle. On Wednesday following, the bugle horn was shot for, at nine score and ten yards, and won by Thomas Fetherstone, Esq. of Packwood; and on Friday, the annual grand target was shot, and the gold and silver medals were both won by William Palmer, Esq. — The ladies were very numerous; near fifty dined at their ordinary, at the Bull's-Head, each of the days, and there was a ball at the Forest Hall, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings. A gold bugle and gold arrow were given to the ladies (by way of lottery); Miss Mary Mordaunt, daughter of Sir John Mordaunt, and Miss Moland, youngest daughter of Richard Moland, of Springfield, Esq. were the fortunate ladies; the former drawing the gold bugle, and the latter the gold arrow. Amongst the ladies were Lady Aylesford, Lady Charlotte Legge, Lady and three Miss Mordaunts, two Miss Bagots, Mrs. and Miss Grimes, Mrs. Adderley, Mrs. Adams, &c. &c. Between fifty and sixty Woodmen of Arden attended, and the shooting was justly allowed to be very good.

Recent Dispute concerning a Prosecution for Killing Game, in the County of Berks.

Pangbourn, Sept. 5, 1794.

AFTER an award made by John Lane and Henry Dampier, Esquires, barristers at law, in two causes, wherein William Bartholomew was plaintiff, and Joseph Green and Richard Green were defendants, which came on for trial at the last Lent assizes, at Reading; and, on the recommendation of the judge, were referred to the above gentlemen, who, on examining the respective proofs and allegations of the different parties, awarded not only the defendants to pay to the plaintiff a certain sum, therein specified, for their misconduct in continuing to sport on Pangbourn Manor, after they had been forbidden by Dr. Breedon, but likewise recommended, in order to restore harmony and good neighbourhood between the parties, that they should do so no more; yet, in defiance of the above award, they did, on the 3d day of September instant, in company with —— Kent, of Sonning, come again upon the said manor, manor, and ufed very grofs and illiberal language to the faid Dr. Breedon; this is therefore to give notice, that we fhall, in future, profecute all perfons who fhall trefpafs upon, or purfue game without the confent of Dr. Breedon, as lord of the faid manor of Pangbourn.

John Bartholomew, fen.
Wm. Bartholomew,
John Bartholomew, jun.
Benjamin Cottrell,
John Bowfher.

Whereas Dr. Breedon, has had "effrontery," which is a harfh expreffion, to mifreprefent feveral particulars refpecting the trial and award alluded to in his advertifement in the laft Reading Paper, I think it neceffary, in vindication of myfelf, to lay before the public a few facts relating to this malicious profecution. Dr. Breedon boldly afferts that I continued to fport on his manor laft feafon, after I had been forbidden; whereas I never in my life carried a gun on his lands before or after the two days fpecified in the information, and it was on the laft of thefe two days he met and forbade me, but he was kind enough to bring two feparate actions againft me for thefe two days fport, the more, as he exultingly faid "to touch Old Green's pocket." With equal untruth Dr. B. tells the public that the trial was given up, and the caufe referred to Meffrs. Lane and Dampier, "on the recommendation of the judge;" whereas in confequence of the overtures his counfel (Mr. Plomer) was commiffioned with, it was agreed before the judge came into court, by Mr. Plomer and my, counfel, (Mr. Mills) to leave it to reference as above; though the Dr. could not help telling a friend of mine in court, who afked him how it was fettled, that I was to beg his pardon. By Dr. Breedon's advertifement, the reader is led to fuppofe I have again been killing game on his manor, "in defiance of the award," but I would have it underftood, that if I was Sporting thereon, "the third inftant," it was without gun or greyhound, for the Dr. was fo candid as to tell me, that if he had then found me with a gun, he would have helped me to an apartment in Newgate.

In extenuation of his fevere and rancorous proceedings, Dr. Breedon has publicly declared at a parifh meeting at Pangbourn, that his bofom friend Mr. Southby, perfuaded him to profecute: if he did, (which I am very unwilling to believe) I cannot too publicly acknowledge my moft unfeigned obligations to that gentleman for fuch a diftinguifhed MARK, of his kindnefs and attention.

As Dr. Breedon fometimes takes it into his head to envelope his heels in petticoats, it may not be amifs to apprife thofe gentlemen who may venture to fport on the manor without his "particular permiffion," that fhould they upon the report of a gun defcry a furious, yet feminine-looking figure advancing with hafty ftrides towards them, they may without hefitation pronounce IT to be this metamorphofed Doctor of Divinity.

To trouble you, gentlemen, with the difputes and animofities of individuals, feems to call for an apology, which I readily make for this obtrufion, and am, gentlemen. Yours, &c.

JOSEPH GREEN.

Reading, Sept. 13, 1794.

Whereas

Whereas on the third day of September instant, I, Rt. Kent, of Sonning, paid a visit to a particular acquaintance, (Mr. Green of Pangbourn) and took the diversion off shooting on ——— Breedon's manor of Pangbourn, and was ungenteely treated by the aforesaid ——— Breedon, by being ordered off his manor, as soon as he saw me, (not knowing each other) I think it necessary to inform ——— Breedon, after such ungenteel treatment, and to give this public notice, that I will shoot upon the said ——— Breedon's manor as often as I can make it convenient to myself, in defiance of ——— Breedon.

Account of a new Game at Cards called Sentiments, invented by Lady M. Bertie, and played in most polite circles.

To play this game, you must first throw all the sixes, fives and fours out of the pack, except the four of clubs; likewise all the trays and deuces, except the deuce of hearts; the remaining cards, being thirty-four in number, is sufficient for playing this game.

The knave of hearts, if hearts are trumps, is the principal, which, if turned out by the dealer, wins the game without further playing, and the dealer takes up all the stakes deposited; but if he is not turned up as the very trump card, he is superior to all, if hearts are trumps, and the person in whose possession it is, takes up one stake. If diamonds, clubs, or spades are trumps then the knave of hearts is inferior to the queen of that suit. The next in power, and (if hearts is not trumps) the highest is the deuce of hearts, which always retains a superiority, except when hearts is trumps.

Then follows the four of clubs, the eight of spades is next, then the nine of diamonds, and lastly the nine of hearts. These five cards never change their power. Then follow the ace, king, queen knave, and remaining trump cards in their old order. Lastly, the ace, king, queen, &c. of the other cards.

The Rules of the Game.

1. Not less then three, or more than five play at this game.

2. The cards are laid down on the table, and as many as are engaged, cut for deal.

3. The highest deals. In cutting the cards for deal, no regard is paid to the knave and deuce of hearts, &c. but the ace is counted the highest, then the king, queen, knave, &c.

4. Every person deposits stakes on the table, whatever the company agrees to, every game.

5. He that is to deal, shuffles the cards, and the player on his right, cuts them, which done, he deals round one card at a time, beginning with the person who sits on his left hand; and having dealt six cards to each, he turns up trumps from the pack.

6. If the dealer turns up the knave for trumps, he wins the game: but if he turns any of the other five ruling cards, then he takes up only his own stake.

7. As soon as every one has ranged their cards, the person on the left of the dealer plays first, and so on, each in their turn.

8. Every

8. Every player must follow suit if they have any, if not, they may play what they please, or may take it with a trump, or any of the ruling cards; and it ought to be observed, that the knave of hearts, and the other five ruling cards are always trumps, and ought to be used as such.

9. He that makes the first six tricks wins the game, and takes up all the stakes.

10. If any player has either four aces, four kings, four queens, or four knaves in hand at once, they also win the game.

11. If any player has in his hand three aces, kings, queens, or knaves, they score two, and four tricks more make the game.

12. If one of the players have ace, king, queen, and knave of one suit, or the king, queen, knave, and ten, or any four succeeding cards in hand of the same suit, they likewise count two for them.

13. If you have five succeeding cards, you count four.

14. And if you have six succeeding cards, you win the game.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

THE fatal consequences which arise from the bite of a mad dog, and of which we have such frequent proofs, induce me to offer to the public, through the medium of your Magazine, the following narrative, well attested by a foreign physician, who made the experiment.

A large house dog, which was attacked with this dosorder, seized upon, and bit in a severe manner, a sow in the same yard, and having roughly treated a small dog, made his escape. Though these were the first symtoms of madness which the dog had shewn, yet the physician, under whose observation this happened, immediately had the sow confined in a stall, boarded so as to exclude all air, except in such quantities as he chose to admit. Food was conveyed to the animal by means of a trough which went through the boards of the stall, and emptied itself into another trough on the inside. For some days the animal eat as usual; but on the sixth or seventh, it began to look heavy and refuse its food; on the ninth or tenth, the disorder was at its height: The physician at least suspected it from the saliva which appeared about the jaws, and the frequent chasing of the animal at bits of straw. It at length lay down, as if exausted with fatigue. Immediately an iron pot with four or five gallons of the best vinegar, boiling was put into the stall, which was shut so as totally to exclude the air. After a space of five or six hours, the physician paid a visit to his patient, whom he found lapping the vinegar. In a few hours after, a fresh quantity of boiling vinegar was placed in the stall, which was shut up till the next day, when food, in which some vinegar was mixed, was offered to the creature, who eat a part. From that day the animal was served twice in the day, with vinegar in its food, for the space of six weeks; at the end of that time it was let out, apparently perfectly well; and had several farrows of pigs after that. The dog, which was bitten, was treated in the same manner, with equal success.

A cure was effected upon even the author of this misfortune; for for, returning home in a few days without the fit being on him, a servant was tempted, by means of a reward, to seize and chain him to his kennel. That, on the following day, his fit returned; and after gnawing, and biting the chain, until his mouth was covered with blood, he lay down: some boiling vinegar was then put almost under his nose, by means of a long ladle; this produced the same effects as on the hog, and he was also cured.

I have read of a cure effected at Turin, by means of vinegar, which was unintentionally given for some other medicine. Possibly, the person administered it through design, to try the experiment. Half a pint was the accidental dose, which was repeated morning and evening after the good effects became visible.

To destroy a dog, at the moment he has bitten a person, is, I conceive, injudicious in the extreme, since it leaves the unhappy sufferer a prey to all those terrors and anxieties which may naturally be supposed to arise in the mind, under the apprehensions of so dreadful a complaint.

The facts are ascertained; let the faculty reason upon the causes. As a wish of being useful to humanity, is the sole cause of my addressing you on this subject, so I doubt not, but influenced by the same motive, you will spare this a place in your Magazine, though it should only be supported by the name of,

Your humble Servant,

VIATOR.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine,

GENTLEMEN,

THE depredations committed since the commencement of the tax on sporting, on the real farmers, by persons taking out a cheaper licence, under the claim of being game-keepers, occasions the request from many, of your publishing for the security of property, the following abstract from the act for the preservation of the game, passed in the year 1716: "Whereas it is become usual for lords of manors to grant deputations to the farmers, tenants, and occupiers of lands, to be game-keepers, with power to kill game; which practice tends to the destruction of the same: for remedy whereof, be it enacted, that no lord of a mannor shall appoint any game-keeper, with power to kill game, unless such person be qualified by the laws of the land so to do; or unless such person be truly and properly a servant to the said lord, or immediately employed to kill game, for the sole use of the same lord." It appears, therefore, as plain as any enacting words can make it, the above pretended game-keepers, unless qualified by the possession of one hundred pounds a year, real property, are liable to all the penalties against sporting illegally; and the lords of manors, granting it to such farmers, tenants, or occupiers of land, and thus foolishly encouraging in them profligate waste of their time and labour, are themselves liable to the penalty of not entering them annually with the assessors, and paying the tax on each game-keeper, agreeably to the express words in the act, taxing male-servants; and the surveyors of this tax are liable to information for neglect of duty, in not checking the game-keepers, entered with, and paying for, to the assessors of parishes, with those annually published by the clerk of the peace, and surcharging all that are not so entered and paid for.

AN ASSOCIATOR.

A TREATISE on FARRIERY, with ANATOMICAL PLATES.

THE stomach is a membranous bag, seated behind the diaphragm or midriff. It is in shape like the bellows of a bagpipe, and has two orifices; the right of which is joined to the gullet, and the left, named pyloris, to the guts. It consists of the same membranes and coats as the gullet.

The intestines or guts are six in number; namely, the small gut, which in a man is divided in the duodenum, the jejunum, and the ilion, and is commonly about twenty-six yards in length: the cæcum, or blind gut, the three colons, and the straight gut. The three colons are divided by two small necks, each about half a yard long. On the upper and under sides there are two ligaments, which run along the surface, and serve to purse up this gut, which with a valve on the inside serve to keep up the aliment from passing off too hastily, that the nutricious juice may be extracted. The straight gut runs directly along from the colon to the fundament, and is half a yard long. The guts have the same coats as the gullet, but are considerably thicker in these last-mentioned, and like it are always moistened by the liquor proceeding from the glands.

The guts are fastened to the back by the mesentery, which is about nine inches broad from the guts to the back. It takes its rise from the third vertebræ of the loins, and consists of two membranes, which are full of small glands and blood-vessels, and is formed by the doubling of the peritonæum. It forms several folds along its circumference, not unlike a ruffle, to which the small guts are connected.

Having thus taken notice of the intestinal canal, and its several parts, it will not be improper to make some observations on the progress of the chyle. If you open a dog that has been just kil ed two or three hours after it has been fed, you will see on the guts, especially those that are small, a great number of little white vessels called lacteals, which glide between the two membranes of the mesentery, and communicating with each other, advance to the glandulous body placed in the middle. From this substance other lacteal veins proceed, which differ nothing from the former, but in being fewer in number, and somewhat more large. These are called secondary lacteals, and are discharged into a cellular and membranous b g, generally placed on the first vertebræ of the loins, and is hid in part of the right appendix of the diaphragm. This is called the reservatory of the chyle. From this reservatory the thoracic duct proceeds, which runs along the vert bræ of the back, and towards the middle of the back turns to the left, and empties itself into a large vein called the left subclavian.

The lacteal veins are not only to be met with on the small intestines, but also on the large, which show that an animal may be kept alive by nourishing clysters only.

The liver is a conglomerate gland of a very large size, of a reddish brown colour, and of a pretty firm consistence. It makes up a great part of the right side and a portion of the middle epigastric re ion, immediately below the diaphragm or midriff. In a horse it is divided into four lobes, lobes, to render it flexible in all violent motions, and so preserve it from danger. Of these the right lobe is much the largest, and is called the great lobe of the liver.

The shape of the liver is not regular, but accommodates its conformation to the adjacent parts. It is convex and smooth on the upper side, to tally with the diaphragm, to which it is connected, and whose motions it follows.—Its inferior surface is concave, and unequal, having eminencies and cavities which answer to the spaces that are between the organs. The eminencies belong to the great lobe of the liver, to which the ancients gave the name of portæ.

The liver is connected to the adjacent parts, but chiefly to the midriff, by means of four ligaments. Some reckon the umbilical veins a ligament, but this is very much doubted by others.

The liver is covered by a thin membrane, which, however, may be divided into two laminæ, between which there is a great number of lymphatic vessels, which are observable both on the convex and concave surface. The internal lamina seems to penetrate the substance of the liver, and to divide it into a great number of small lobes, which may be easily distinguished in a hog.

The substance of the liver is an assemblage of a great number of small vessels of every kind, which appear to be distributed to a great number of vehicles or small bodies, called of late pulpous grains. These vessels, thus distributed, may be distinguished into those that carry some liquor, and into those that bring it back. The first are the ramifications of the hepatic artery, of the venæ portæ, and of the hepatic nerves.

The vena portæ is a considerable trunk of a vein formed by two principal branches, one of which receives the blood which comes from the spleen, the pancreas, and one part of the stomach. It is called the splenetic vein. The other proceeds from the intestines and the mesentery. This trunk of a vein penetrates the liver on the concave side; but, before its entry, forms two other branches, one on the right, and the other on the left. Likewise there are many lesser branches, which enter the vesicles of the liver. The other vessels which belong to the vesicles are branches of the veins, which correspond with the vena cava, and discharge the remainder of the blood which the vena portæ has deposited in the liver. The union of these branches form three veins, called the hepatic veins, which terminate in the trunk of the lower vena cava, immediately below the diaphragm.

The lymphatic veins of the liver may be seen on both sides, where they form a wonderful kind of net-work. These veins generally empty themselves into the reservoir or receptacle of the chyle.—The pulpous veins have an excretory duct, which communicate with each other in the substance of the liver, and are commonly called the biliary pores. When these ducts are united, they form a large one, called the hepatic duct, which discharges the bile into the small gut near the stomach. It is proportionably larger in horses than in other animals, because they have no gall-bladder. Some say this is wanting because it might be hurt by violent motions: but this cannot not be the caſe, becauſe many animals that are ſubject to as violent exerciſe as a horſe, are not without a gall-bladder; and therefore I ſhall not pretend to gueſs at the reaſon, or why a larger and conſtant diſcharge of the bile is required in a horſe more than any other creature that feeds in the ſame manner.

The uſe of the liver is to ſeparate this gall or bile already mentioned, and there is reaſon to believe it is brought to the liver by the vena portæ. The gall is a yellow, bitter liquor, of a pretty fluid conſiſtence, compoſed not only of a ſeroſity and ſalts, but alſo of unctuous particles, which form a liquor of a ſoapy nature, and nearly of the ſame taſte, and is very uſeful to take old ſpots out of garments.

The gall being ſeparated in the liver, is taken up by the biliary pores, then runs into the hepatic duct, and is conſtantly diſcharged into the gut abovementioned.—It ſerves to correct the aliment, and to prepare the chyle.

The pancreas is a conglomerate gland, of a very pale red, and of a pretty thick conſiſtence. It is ſeated in the epigaſtric region, tranſverſely, immediately below the ſtomach, reaching from the ſmall gut to the ſpleen, to which it is united. The ſituation of the pancreas is ſuch, that it may be reckoned to have two faces, an upper and a lower, two edges, the anterior and the poſterior, and two extremities, the one to the right, and the other to the left; that to the right, which is connected to the gut, is moſt conſiderable.

The pancreas is covered with two membranes, the one common, and the other proper. The common conſiſts of the two leaves of the meſocolon, between which the pancreas is ſeated. The proper membrane immediately covers its ſubſtance, and is compoſed of many glandulous grains, beſet with a vaſt number of veſſels, whereof ſome carry a fluid to the pancreas, and ſome bring one back from thence. The former are the arteries and nerves; the latter are the ſanguinary and lymphatic veins, as well as the excretory ducts of the glands.

The excretory ducts of the pancreas are very numerous, perhaps as many as the glandulous grains of which it is compoſed. All theſe ducts unite with each other, and from their union reſults one common duct, which carries a fluid from them all. It is called the pancreatic duct, and runs all along the pancreas, through the middle of its length, and empties itſelf into the ſmall gut.

The uſe of the pancreas is to ſeparate a fluid called the pancreatic juice, of the nature of ſaliva, and ſerves jointly with the gall to bring the chyle to perfection.

The ſpleen conſiſts of a ſoftiſh ſubſtance, which may be readily extended, and is of a bluiſh colour, a little inclining to the red. It is ſeated obliquely in the left hypochondrium, under the diaphragm or midriff, and immediately above the left kidney. Its ſhape is of a longiſh tongue, and flattiſh.

The ſpleen is kept in its ſituation not only by reſting on the adjacent viſcera, but alſo by membranous ligaments which tie it to the diaphragm, and ſometimes to the ſtomach itſelf, as alſo to the colon and the left kidney, by means of the caul and the blood-veſſels. It has two faces; that that turned towards the ſtomach is unequally concave, and that turned towards the ribs, which is convex.

The principal artery of the ſpleen proceeds from the cœlic, the vein empties itſelf into the vena portæ. The nerves are very numerous, and form the ſplenetic plexus. All theſe, when they enter into the ſpleen, are divided and ſubdivided into a great number of ramifications, and accompany each other to the laſt extremities of their diviſions. They are contained in the common cellular capſule. The blood is extravaſed among all theſe veſſels, and kept in a web like cotton, which is very fine, and ſpread throughout the whole extent of the ſpleen, and terminates in almoſt imperceptible cells, which communicate with each other.

The uſe of the ſpleen is very hard to determine: however it is probable the blood is detained by this means a great while in the ſpleen, in order to prepare it for the ſeparation of the bile, which is afterwards to be performed in the liver.

The capſulæ atrabiliares, called by ſome the renal glands, are two glandulous bodies ſeated on each ſide, a little obliquely on the upper and more internal part of the kidney, and are joined to it by a fine cellular web, and are covered by the external tegument of the kidney itſelf, called the adipous membrane. The ſubſtance of theſe renal glands is ſoft and ſpongy, covered with a fine membrane, and their colour is yellowiſh. In a fœtus they are as large as the kidneys. They have a cavity which contains a yellowiſh liquor, though by ſome ſaid to be black. The uſe of theſe is hitherto unknown.

The kidneys are two conglomerate glands, of a firm conſiſtence, and of a reddiſh brown colour.—They are ſeated in the region of the loin, on the outſide of the peritonæum, and within its cellular web, one on the right end, and the other on the left, between the laſt of the falſe ribs and the bone called the ileum. The right lies upon the lower part of the liver, and the other under the ſpleen, which laſt is commonly placed higher than the other.—The right kidney is ſomewhat triangular, the left oval, and the higher part bigger than the lower.

The arteries belonging to the kidneys, are called the emulgent arteries, and are generally two, one for each kidney. The veins in the kidney accompany the arteries, and when they are united into one trunk, they are called the emulgent veins. A principal veſſel belonging to the kidney is called the ureter. It is a membranous pipe which receives the urine, as it is ſeparated by the kidney, to carry it to the bladder.

The kidney has two coverings; the firſt conſiſts of the cellular web of the peritonæum, and generally contains a great deal of fat. This being removed, you may diſcover the proper tegument or covering of the kidney which it ſurrounds. It conſiſts of two laminæ, which are united by a fine cellular web, and between theſe the lymphatic veſſels creep along.

The kidney is compoſed of three different ſubſtances: the firſt is the cortical, which conſiſts of a great number of blood and nervous veſſels with glandulous grains. The ſecond is tubulous, and is compoſed of urinary pipes, which change into the third ſubſtance, called the papillary, becaufe it ends in ten or twelve papillæ full of fmall holes, which open into the pelvis or bafon. This laft is the membranous cavity of the kidney, fending forth tubes or pipes which embrace the papillæ like funnels.

cauſe

The ureters are membranous canals or pipes which reach from the kidneys to the bladder wherein they are inferted obliquely above its neck. The coats are fuppofed to be like thofe of the guts.

The bladder is a membranous bag, whofe fituation is well known, and is connected to the peritonæum only by its pofterior and fuperior part, and therefore may be opened without hurting that part. The force and lower part is called the neck. Its coats, like the inteftines, are common, mufcular, and nervous. This laft being the inner, is exceeding fenfible.

Next the neck of the bladder is the urethra, through which the urine is conveyed out of the body, and is much longer in horfes than in mares. The bladder is connected in horfes to the regnum or ftraight gut, and the feminal veffels; in mares to the vagina, and in both to the os pubis, by ligamentous and flefhy fibres.

In the middle of the upper part there is a ligamentous chord called the ruachus, which terminates at the navel and is a continuation of the membranes of the bladder. The kidneys feparate the excrementious fluid from the blood, called the urine, which paffes through the papillæ into the funnels, and from thence into the bafon, and is difcharged by the ureter into the bladder, where it remains for fome time by the help of a fphincter which furrounds its neck, and ftops its paffage, till an uneafinefs happens, which caufes a contraction of its mufcular coat; then with the affiftance of the mufcles of the belly and the midriff, the refiftance of the fphincter is overpowered, and fo the urine efcapes. The urine is much of the fame nature as the fweat, and they have fuch a relation to one another, that when the one is encreafed, the other is diminifhed.

The firft thing to be confidered in the organs of generation, are the tefticles or ftones, whofe fituation is well known. Their fhape is oval, a little flatted on the fides, their coverings are common and proper: the common is the fkin in which they are contained, which is divided into two parts, the one right and the other left, which outwardly appears like a feam. The proper membranes are, firft, the vaginal, which confift of feveral membranous cells, and is a continuation of the cellular web of the peritonæum and covers the whole tefticle as well as its veffels. The fecond is a reddifh membrane which adheres clofe to the former, and is only an expanfion of a ligament. Under the vaginal coat there is a bag proper to each tefticle, which furrounds them, and is only connected to the epididymes. Laftly, the albuginious which is ftrong, and adheres clofely to the fubftance of the tefticles. It receives the fpermatic veffels, and tranfmits them to the teftes. The proper veffels are the fpermatic arteries, which arife by a fmall beginning from the great artery, and the fpermatic veins.

The epididymes are two, one to each tefticle, which lie on the fuperior part in the fhape of a caterpillar. Their fubftance is vafculous, and all the veffels open into into one duct called the vas deferens, by which it transmits the seed which it receives from the testes.

The vas deferens is a whitish pipe which looks like a nerve, and reaches to the seminal vessels and the urethra. Their use is to convey the seed to the seminal vessels and to the urethra itself at the time of covering a mare.

The seminal vessels are seated under the bladder, near its neck, and are divided into various cells, which communicate with each other. Each vessel has an excretory duct, which opens with a double orifice inth the urethra on the under side, near the neck of the bladder.

The yard is the chief organ of generation, whose shape and size are well known. It begins with two bodies which unite under the os pubis, to which they are connected by a ligament. The inner texture is spungy, on the under part of which is the urethra for the passage of the urine before-mentioned. It is lined with a membrane full of small glands, which separate a liquor that defends it from the acrimony of the urine.

The parts of generation of a mare are analogous to those of a woman; and that they have a clitoris is plain from an hermaphrodite of this species who was carried about for a show. The bottom of the womb is divided into two parts, called horns, as in other quadrupeds. But I need not be more particular in describing these parts, because, if due care be taken, they seldom or never come under the consideration of a farrier.

OF THE PARTS CONTAINED IN THE THORAX OR CHEST.

The second cavity of the trunk of the body is the chest, which is bounded on the lower part by the midriff, on the upper by the two first true ribs with the collar bones, on the fore part by the sternum and the extremities of the ribs, and on the back part by the extremities of the ribs that join to the back-bone, and by the back-bone itself.

The proper containing parts of the chest are boney, fleshy, and membranous. The boney parts are the ribs, the vertebræ of the back, and the sternum. The fleshy are the intercostal muscles, the sterno-costal, and the midriff. Among the membranous the pleura is chief.

The parts contained are the heart and the lungs.

The pleura is a membrane of a close texture, which lines the chest throughout its whole extent, and supplies the other parts contained therein with a covering. The internal surface of the pleura is smooth and polished, and always moist with a serosity that oozes from the pores, and is covered outwardly with a cellular web like the peritonæum. The pleura makes a fold or doubling at the vertebræ of the back, which terminates the whole length of the sternum. The doubling is called the mediastinum. It separates the chest into two parts, the one right, and the other left. It does not adhere to the middle of the sternum, but a little to the left, whence the right cavity is largest.

The two laminæ, whereof the mediastinum consists, are not separated from each other immediately behind the sternum in the fore part, but afterwards recede from each other to make room for several parts, as the pericardium, part of the windpipe, the gullet, the thoracic duct, &c.

Each

Each laminæ forms a kind of purse for each lobe of the lungs.

The mediastinum serves to hinder the passage of any fluid shed on one side of the breast from passing into the other. This partition secures a free breathing on one side, if the chest should be opened on the other. It also hinders one side of the lungs from resting upon the other, when a horse lies on one side.

The thymus is a glandulous body seated in the upper part of the thorax, immediately under the sternum: its use is uncertain.

The pericardium is a membranous purse of a close texture, which immediately incloses the heart, and which is placed between the two leaves of the mediastinum; the figure is like that of the heart, but leaves room enough for its motions. It is connected to the mediastinum, to the diaphragm, and to the great vessels of the heart. It contains a liquor to lubricate the surface of the heart, and serves to keep it in its proper place.

The heart is a hollow muscle of a conic figure, which is the principal organ of the circulation of the blood. The larger part is called the basis, the smaller the point. It inclines to the left, where its beating may be perceived. At the basis of the heart are two small purses, which seem to be appendices, and are called the right and left auricles of the heart. The right is the largest. They have each two orifices, whereof one answers to the vein which discharges itself therein, and the other to its proper ventricle. Each auricle consists of a double row of semicircular fleshy fibres, and are strengthened by others, in the shapes of columns, between which there are considerable spaces. These contract when the ventricles are dilated, and dilate when the ventricles are contracted; they being antagonist muscles to each other.

The Ventricles are two remarkable cavities; the one is the right, and the other the left. The right is thinner, weaker, and larger than the left. It receives the blood from the vena cava and the right auricles, and drives it into the pulmonary artery and the lungs. The left is stronger and thicker, and not so large. It receives the blood from the pulmonary vein and the left auricle, and forces it into the great artery.

The columnæ carnæ, or fleshy columns, are in the ventricles as well as the auricles; and are so many small muscles, by the concourse of whose membranous fibres, are formed peculiar membranes, called valves, placed at the orifices of the auricles. The columns run transversely from one side of the ventricle to the other, partly that they may assist the contraction of the heart in the systole, and partly to prevent too great a dilitation in the diastole.

The Valves are of three kinds: tricuspidal, which are three, and placed at the orifice of the right ventricle, which answers to the auricle on the same side. Mitral, which are seated in the left ventricle, where it communicates with the auricle, preventing the returning of the blood into the heart from the veins. The semilunar, which are three, and are placed at the beginning of the great, as also at the pulmonary artery, to hinder the return of the blood from the arteries into the heart.

The muscular fibres of the heart are in some places straight, in others spiral. These are of a double double order; the external, which run from the basis and tendon of the heart towards the left; the internal, which run towards the right, and interfect the former. When they act, they constringe their cavities regularly, and expel the blood, which is called the systole. When they are relaxed, the two ventricles are dilated; this is called the diastole. The auricles are the two hollow muscles which are the antagonists of the ventricles, for they contract when the ventricles are dilated; and when the ventricles contract they are dilated, as was observed before.

The blood-vessels of the heart are of two kinds; the proper veins and arteries, called the coronary, distributed through the heart; and the common, of which two are veins; the vena cava, and the pulmonary vein; and two arteries, the great artery, and the pulmonary artery.

The use of the heart is to promote the circulation of the blood; for it receives the blood from all parts of the body by the veins, and by its contraction sends it back to all parts of the body by the arteries. Upon these not only the functions of the body depend, but even life itself.

The lungs, commonly called the lights, is the largest viscus in the chest, and is divided into two parts or lobes, one on each side of the mediastinum, and contain the heart in the middle. They are not subdivided in a horse so much as in other quadrupeds. Each lobe is divided into small cells, which are the extremities of the asperia arteria, whence the substance is vesiculous and spungy.

The lungs are not only connected to the sternum and to the vertebræ of the back by the mediastinum, and to the heart by its vessels, but also to the pharynx and the tongue by means of the windpipe. There are also two membranous ligaments, which advancing from the posterior edge of each lobe, terminate in the vetebræ of the back, as far as the diaphragm.

The lungs are covered with a membrane which is continued to the pleura. This membrane has two laminæ, the internal of which forms several partitions which penetrate into the substance of the lungs, and divide it into innumerable small bodies called lobules, of various angular figures. These lobules have spaces between them, in which the nerves and blood vessels lie, which make ramifications on the external surface of the lobules. There is likewise a cellular web in these spaces, which surrounds the nerves and blood vessels.

The air cannot pass from one of the lobules into another, but only from the lobules into the cells which surround the blood-vessels which lie therein, and back from these spaces or cells into the lobules. There are therefore two sorts of cells, the bronchic cells, of which the lobules consist, and the vascular cells, which surround the vessels.

The trachea arteria, or windpipe, begins at the bottom of the mouth, and runs along the middle and anterior part of the neck, and goes to be distributed into the lungs by a great number of ramifications. The upper part of this is called the larynx, and the ramifications in the lungs the bronchia. The trachea arteria is a pipe which is partly cartalaginous, and partly membranous; the former is the fore part, and the latter is the hind part.

THE THEATRE.

HAYMARKET.

A NEW comedy was presented on Saturday evening, Auguft 9, under the title of "How to be Happy."—The following are the characters of the drama :—

Sir Charles Manley	Mr. Aickin.
Young Manley	Mr. Barrymore.
Sir Harry Harlowe	Mr. Suett.
Young Harlowe	Mr. C. Kemble.
Sedgegrove	Mr. Palmer.
Scamper	Mr. Fawcett.
Fitzgerald	Mr. Johnftone.
Mumps	Mr. Parfons.
Lady Julia	Mrs. Gibbs.
Julia Harcourt	Mrs Kemble.
Mrs Furnifh	Mrs. Hopkins.
Mrs. Scamper	Mrs. Harlowe.

The fcene of this comedy is laid at Brighthelmftone. Young Harlowe and Young Manley are nephews half-difcarded, and totally unknown to their refpective uncles. The latter arriving firft, and finding that Sir Charles is about to give his ward Lady Julia to Mr. Harlowe, takes that gentleman's name, and makes his approaches to his uncle, and his addreffes to the lady. The latter, being enamoured of Julia Harcourt, lends his countenance to the deception, until, from a change of circumftances, he fhall be enabled to develope the impofter. Sedgerove is the guardian of Julia Harcourt, who is driven by the embarraffment of his affairs, and the advice of Scamper, a gambling fwindler, to name to her a hufband, of whom he is aware, her attachment to Harlowe will lead her to difapprove, for the purpofe of obtaining her fortune, which by that refufal devolves to himfelf. The infamy of Scamper is foon detected. He endeavours to enfnare Sedgerove into an intrigue with his wife, whom he paffes for a foreign lady of quality. He mars this fcheme by returning intoxicated to her home, where Sedgegrove overhears him from his concealment. The latter is in confequence determined to do juftice to Mifs Harcourt, and by his repentance, the uncles are conciliated, and the lovers made happy.

From this fketch, our readers will fee how little there is in this drama that is new, and how much lefs that is probable. It is faid in the prologue, to come from "an untried pair," and is of courfe entitled to all the lenity of criticifm.—There is a good attempt at contraft of characters in the portraits of the two uncles, the one of whom views mankind on the dark, and the other on the bright fide of the picture: there is much humour alfo in the homely character of Mumps, catching not only the paffions, but the diforders of his mafter.

The remarks on men and manners are fuch as may be fuppofed to iffue from a juvenile obfervation. The dialogue has not the combination of a ftrong, or the refearches of an informed mind. If the author be young, his work is not without promife; if he has feen many years, we fhould advife him to quit the purfuit of fo capricious a miftrefs as the Dramatic Mufe.

The moral throughout is unexceptionable; the cataftrophe inculcates in the inftance of Sedgegrove, that every departure from virtue is a deviation from the way "to be happy."

The comedy was given out with a mixture of applaufe and difapprobation, for a fecond performance.

ANECDOTES of MR. PHILLIDOR.
Communicated by himself.

ANDRE Danican Phillidor, was born at Dreux, near Paris, in 1726. His grandfather was a hautboy-player at the court of Louis XIII. An Italian mufician named Phillidor, was admired at that court for his performance on the fame inftrument; and after his departure, the king gave Mr. Danican the sobriquet, or nick-name of Phillidor, which has ftill remained in the family. His father and feveral of his brothers, belonged to the band of Lewis XIV. and XV.

At fix years of age he was admitted among the children of the Chapel-Royal, at Verfailles, where, being obliged to attend daily, he had an opportunity of learning chefs from the muficians in waiting, of whom there were about eighty. Cards not being allowed fo near the Chapel, they had a long table, with fix chefs-boards inlaid.

At the age of eleven, a motet, or pfalm with choruffes, of his compofition, was performed, which pleafed Louis XV. fo much, that he gave the compofer five louis; this encouraged the lad to compofe four more. When he had attained his fourteenth year, he left the Chapel, and was then reputed the moft fkilful chefs player of the band. This was in 1740, when feveral motets of his compofition were performed at Paris, at the Concert Spirituel, which were favourably received by the public as the production of a child, who was already a mafter and teacher of mufic.

At this time chefs was played at, in almoft every coffee-houfe in Paris, and he applied fo clofely to the game, that he neglected his fcholars, and they confequently took another mafter. This induced him rather to purfue the ftudy of chefs than of mufic. Mr. de Kermui, Sire de Legalle, who is ftill living, and was then near forty years of age, was efteemed the beft chefs-player in France, and young Phillidor fought every opportunity of receiving his inftructions, by which he improved fo effentially, that three years after, Mr. de Legalle, though ftill his mafter, was not able to allow him any advantage.

Mr. de Legalle once afked him whether he had ever tried to play by memory, without feeing the board? Phillidor replied, that as he had calculated moves, and even whole games at night in bed, he thought he could do it, and immediately played a game with the Abbé Chenard, which he won without feeing the board, and without hefitating upon any of the moves; this was a circumftance much fpoken of in Paris, and, in confequence, he often repeated this method of playing.

Phillidor then finding he could readily play a fingle game, offered to play two games at the fame time, which he did at a coffee-houfe; and of this party the following account is given in the French Encyclopedie:

"We had at Paris, a young man of eighteen, who played at the fame time, two games at chefs, without feeing the boards, beating two antagonifts, to either of whom he, though a firft-rate player, could only give the advantage of a knight when feeing the board. We fhall add to this account, a circumftance of which we were eye-witneffes. In the middle of one of his games, a falfe move was defignedly made, which, after a great number of moves; moves, he diſcovered, and placed the piece where it ought to have been at firſt, This young man is named Mr. Phillidor, the ſon of a muſician of repute; he himſelf is a great muſician, and perhaps the beſt player of Poliſh draughts there ever was, or ever will be. This is among the moſt extraordinary examples of ſtrength of memory, and of imagination."

Forty years after this, he played two different times in London, three games at once. Of one of theſe exertions, the following account appeared in the London newſpapers in May, 1783:

"Yeſterday, at the cheſs club in St. James's-ſtreet, Mr. Phillidor performed one of thoſe wonderful exhibitions for which he is ſo much celebrated. He played at the ſame time three different games, without ſeeing either of the tables. His opponents were, Count Bruhl, Mr. Bowdler (the two beſt players in London) and Mr. Maſeres. He defeated Count Bruhl in an hour and twenty minutes, and Mr. Maſeres in two hours. Mr. Bowdler reduced his game to a drawn battle in an hour and three quarters. To thoſe who underſtand cheſs, this exertion of Mr. Phillidor's abilities muſt appear one of the greateſt of which the human memory is ſuſceptable. He goes through it with aſtoniſhing accuracy, and often corrects miſtakes in thoſe who have the board before them. Mr. Phillidor ſets with his back to the tables, and ſome gentleman preſent who takes his part, informs him of the move of his antagoniſt, and then, by his direction, plays his pieces as he dictates."

The other match was with Count Bruhl, Mr. Jennings, and Mr. Erſkine, to the laſt of whom he gave a pawn and the move: the Count made a drawn game, and both the other gentlemen loſt their games.

But to return: in 1745, he became acquainted with an Italian named Lanza, whoſe daughter was looked on as a prodigy for her talents on the harpſichord, though but thirteen years of age. This man engaged Phillidor to go with him to Holland, to meet Geminiani, who had promiſed his aſſiſtance in giving twelve ſubcription concerts, in which the girl was to perform. She being indiſpoſed, was left with her mother at Paris: and at Rotterdam her father received the news of her death.

Thus Phillidor found himſelf in a foreign country, pennyleſs, and bereft of all his hopes of advantage from the propoſed concerts. His ſkill at draughts was now a great reſource to him at Rotterdam and Amſterdam: he remained a twelvemonth in Holland, reſiding chiefly at the Hague, where he became acquainted with Colonel la Deves, a relation of the late Lord Ligonier, and with the Prince of Waldeck, who then commanded the Dutch army, both cheſs-players; the former was ſo ſkillful, that Phillidor could only give him a knight: the Prince rewarded him nobly for his inſtructions.

(To be concluded in our next.)

PEDIGREE and PERFORMANCES of WINDLESTONE.

WINDLESTONE was foaled in 1783. He was got by Magnet, his dam by Le Sang, Rib, out of Mother Weſtern, by Smith's Son of Snake, (Montague, Hautboy, Brimmin). Windleſtone's

ſtone's dam is the dam of Heireſs, that bred Mr. Wetherell's famous Delpini colt, &c. &c.—The firſt time of his ſtarting, was on Monday, April 17th, 1780, at Catterick Bridge, where he won a Sweepſtakes of 70gs for 3 yr olds, beating Maria, Sylvia, and four others. At Stockton, he won a Sweepſtakes of 70gs for 3 yr olds, two miles, beating Penelope and Omen. At Morpeth, he won 50l. for all ages, beating Dubſkelper, and a filly of Mr. Morris's. In 1787, Windleſtone won 50l. for 4 yr olds, at Durham, beating Omen and Miſs Betſey, at two heats. At York, Auguſt meeting, he won the great ſubſcription for 4 yr olds, 4 miles, beating Maria, Highlander, Trojan, and Shipton, 7 to 1 he won, in running the laſt diſtance. In 1788, Mr. Baker's grey horſe Windleſtone. won a Sweepſtakes of 50gs. two miles, at York Spring Meeting, beating Blemiſh, Bonitas, and Abbeſs, 6 to 4 on Windleſtone. Same week he won 50l two miles and three quarters heat, beating Bramble, Grafton, and Changeling, 5 to 4 againſt him at ſtarting, after the firſt heat 2 to 1 he won. At York, Auguſt Meeting, he won the great ſubſcription of 241gs and 14gs for 5 yr olds, 8ſt. 7lb. four miles, beating Young Tuberoſe, Poor Soldier, Skylark, and Mufti. At Carliſle, he won the King's Plate, for 5 yr olds, at two 4-mile heats, beating Falſtaff; 2 to 1 on Windleſtone. In 1789, Windleſtone, at York Spring Meeting, received 150gs forfeit from the Duke of Hamilton's bay horſe Paragon, 8ſt. 7lb. each, four miles. Same meeting he won a Sweepſtakes of 60gs for all ages, two miles, beating Sir W. Vavaſour's colt, by Vertumnus, (afterwards Baronet) and Young Tuberoſe, 5 to 4 Windleſtone won. Same week he won 50l. for all ages, heats—two miles and three quarters each, beating at two heats (rode by W. Arnett) Tamerlane and an Alfred colt of Mr. Hutchinſon's; 3 to 1 he won. At York, Auguſt Meeting, he won the King's Plate for 6 yr olds, beating Falſtaff; 4 to 1 on Windleſtone. At Edinburgh, October Meeting, he won the King's Plate at three 4-mile heats, beating Newbyth. At Ayr he walked over for a plate of 50l. In 1790, Windleſtone won 50l. for all ages, at Wakefield, at two 4 mile heats, beating Abbeé Thulle, Symmetry, Spangle and Seedling. At Morpeth, he won 50l. for all ages, at two 4 mile heats, beating Oſtrich and Rattler. At Northallerton, Mr. Bell's Windleſtone won 50l. at two 4-mile heats, beating Citizen; 5 to 2 and 3 to 1 he won. He was then ſold to Mr. Fowler; and in 1791, he won 50l. at Cheſter, two 4-mile heats, beating Brown, Charlotte, and Bywell. Next day he won the gold cup, at two 4-mile heats, beating Sulky, Citizen, Evergreen, Florizel, and Labourer. At Newcaſtle, he won 50l. 4-mile heats, beating Scorpion, who was drawn after the firſt heat. At Edinburgh he won 50l. 4-mile heats, beating Country Laſs, who was alſo drawn after the firſt heat. Same meeting he won 50gs at two 4-mile heats, beating Mars and Oſtrich. At Hamilton, he won 50l. 4-mile heats, beating Louiſa, who was drawn after firſt heat.—He never ſtarted but once after, which was at Stockton, againſt Tamerlane and Cavendiſh; he was lame; but, however, beat Tamerlane for the firſt heat; next he was drawn. He is now a ſtallion, at 3gs and 5s blood mares: half-price country mares. His ſtock are very promiſing to make racers, from

Palm-

Palmflower, Columba, Snowdrop, &c. &c. He is remarkably ftrong, well made, and good tempered, &c. &c.

ON HUNTING.

LETTER XIV.

Fox Hunting.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

Gentlemen,

YOUR polite attention to my laft, has given me new courage, and I now fet down to comply with the promife I made you at the conclufion of it.

A fingularity of voice is the moft effential part of a huntfman's halloo, but as fuch a one is feldom to be met with, a preference fhould be given to the horn, to which hounds fly more readily than to the huntfman's voice.—When a fox is hallood, thofe who underftand this bufinefs may get forward and halloo him again, yet they fhould be told if the hounds go a contrary way, or do not feem to come upon the line of him, to halloo no more: fuch halloos as ferve to keep the hounds together, and get on the tail hounds, are always of ufe: halloos of encouragement are too often injudicioufly given, and generally fpoil your fport; however pleafing to the fportfman, halloos in view may be, they are exceedingly prejudicial to the hounds—hence arifes that indifference which fometimes is to be perceived in foxhounds, while purfuing their game; I would recommend it to fportfmen, not to take off the hounds to a halloo, unlefs when the fox is a great way before them, or perfifts in running his foil, for fuch foxes are killed with much difficulty, unlefs endeavours are ufed to get nearer to them.

If hounds be out of blood, and a fox run his foil, you need not fcruple to ftop the tail hounds, and throw them in at head; or if the cover have any ridings cut in it, and the fox be often feen, the hunfman, by keeping fome hounds at his horfe's heels, at the firft halloo that he hears, may throw them in clofe at him—this will put him out of his pace, and, perhaps, put him off his foil; particular directions (when this is done) muft be given to the whipper-in, to ftop the pack, and get forward with them to the huntfman. The obfervation I have before made, that hounds may be hallood too much, is verified in their frequent trufting more to their ears and eyes, than to their nofes.

Mr. Beckford fays, "I have heard of a fportfman who never fuffers his hounds to be lifted; he lets them pick along the coldeft fcent, through flocks of fheep. This is a particular ftyle of fox hunting, which, perhaps may fuit the country in which that gentleman hunts, but I do not think it would fucceed in a bad fcenting country, where foxes are wild:—whilft hounds can get on with the fcent, it cannot be right to take them off from it, but when they are ftopped for want of it, it cannot be wrong to give them every advantage in your power."

There is a great impropriety in fuffering your hounds to hunt after others that are gone on with the fcent, particularly in cover; for the impracticability of their getting up to them with a worfe fcent, muft be obvious: befides, it makes them tie on the fcent, ſcent, teaches them to run dog, and deſtroys (what is the chief excellence of a fox hound) the ambition of getting forward; it ſeldom happens that a good huntſman will ſuffer his hounds to run away from him, but, if ſuch a thing ſhould occur, and they are ſtill within hearing, he will ſink the wind with the reſt of the pack, and get to them as faſt as he can.

I believe it is a generally received opinion among ſportſmen, that ſhirters, both in men and dogs, may be found hurtful: ſuch as ſkirt to ſave their horſes, often head the fox; if you head back the fox, the hounds, moſt probably, will kill him in the brake. I cannot allow that riding cloſe up to the hounds is always the ſign of a good ſportſman; but, however, ſuch as ride after the hounds, at the ſame time that they do no good, are the leaſt likely to do harm. Nor can I, in ſome degree, help cenſuring that ardour, which frequently interrupts, and ſometimes is fatal to ſport in fox-hunting; every perſon who has followed hounds, muſt have often ſeen them hurried beyond the ſcent, and to thoſe converſant in hunting, it cannot but be known, that the ſteam of many horſes, carried by the wind, and mixed with a cold ſcent, is prejudicial to it.

The beſt way, in my opinion, to follow hounds acroſs a country, is to keep on the line of them, and diſmount at once, when you come to a leap which is not agreeable for you to take, much time being loſt in looking about for eaſier places. It may not be improper alſo to know, that in following hounds, when in cover, they run up the wind; in this caſe you cannot be too far behind them, provided you have a perfect hearing; but if on the contrary, they are running down the wind, the nearer you are the better.

It often happens that covers are much diſturbed, which will occaſion foxes to break as ſoon as they hear a hound, but it is leſs likely to be the caſe where the country is round and very open, particularly by the fox that is hunting; he will be very unwilling to quit the cover, if it be a large one, unleſs he can get at a conſiderable diſtance from the hounds.

It is very hurtful to hounds to change the country they have been uſed to; ſhould it happen that it is a bad ſcenting one they have gone into, they may be ſome time without killing a fox.

Dr. Johnſon's obſervations reſpecting the timidity of French huntſmen, inſerted in your twenty-ſecond number, puts me in mind of an anecdote related by Mr. Beckford, of a native of that country who was on a viſit to the late Lord Caſtlehaven—a very great ſportſman, who thought he could not oblige his friend more, than by letting him partake of an amuſement, which he himſelf was ſo fond of. He therefore mounted him on one of his beſt horſes, and ſhewed him a fox chaſe. The Frenchman, after having been well ſhaken, dirtied, tired, run away with, and thrown down, was aſked on his return, "Comment il avoit "trouvé la chaſe?" "Morbleau! "milord," ſaid he, ſhrugging up his ſhoulders, "votre chaſſe eſt une "etraſſe diabolique."

Not doubting but that you, Gentlemen, will laugh heartily at Monſieur's diſaſter, for the preſent I ſhall leave you to that enjoyment, and beg you will believe me to be, &c.

Aug. 29, 1794.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

I AM no great quidnunc, or dabble any way in politics; neither do I believe you are; but, as it is the fashion now, for almost every one to conjure up some frightful political buggaboo, to scare himself withal, in order to avoid being singular, I shall acquaint you with what I have conceived to be a very just proof of alarm.

I wish, sirs, that the race of government should be run fairly, and without any crossing, but am a little afraid that ministers are playing off a piece of jockeyship, by which the people may be taken, and totally deprived of all parliamentary representation. What first started this idea in my mind, was the prodigious increase the peerage is every day receiving, in such a degree, that, so help me God! I think in a short time we shall not have a commoner left worth 500l. a year.

Mark now the effect of this—to be eligible to a seat in the House of Commons, a man must have a qualification of a certain income; but, if all men possessing that qualification are all peers, the people will have no one left among them whom they can elect, and so there is an end of the House of Commons.

This, gentlemen, may appear an extravagant speculation to you, but, da——e if it does to me, who am, gentlemen,

Your's, &c.

A KEEN-ONE.

P. S. I did not mean by this to cause the least alarm to those worthy gentlemen, the Bailiffs, who must infallibly be ruined, by so unbounded an addition to the privileged orders of society. I thought it necessary to say so much, knowing the captious disposition of that fraternity.

Curious Method known by the Ancient Indiaas, of Catching Fish and Wild Fowl. From Mr. Bryan Edwards's valuable History of the West Indies.

"THE Indians of Jamaica, (says the Spanish writer, Oviedo) go a fishing with the remora, or sucking fish, which they employ as falconers employ hawks. This fish, which is not above a span long, is kept for the purpose, and regularly fed.—The owner, on a calm morning, carries it out to sea, secured to his canoe by a small, but strong line, many fathoms in length; and the moment the creature sees a fish in the water, though at a great distance, it darts away with the swiftness of an arrow, and soon fastens upon it; the Indian, in the mean time, loosens and lets go the line, which is provided with a buoy that keeps on the surface of the sea, and serves to mark the course which the remora has taken, and he pursues it in his canoe until he conceives his game to be nearly exhausted, and run down; he then, taking up the buoy, gradually draws the line towards the shore, the remora still adhering with inflexible tenacity to its prey, and it is with difficulty he is made to quit his hold; by this method a turtle has been caught, of bulk and weight which no single man could support.

"Their contrivance for catching wild fowl was equally ingenious, though practised by other nations, particularly the Chinese, I believe

I believe, to this day. In the ponds where these birds frequent, they used to throw calabashes, (a species of gourd) which float about the water, and which being at length accustomed to, the wild fowl would approach without fear, and sometimes even rest upon. Having succeeded thus far, the sportsman puts one of these gourds on his head, (first making apertures for the sight and breath) and very cautiously creeps into the water, either gently swimming, or walking where the stream is shallow, with his head only above the water, until he gets among the fowl, where, seizing one at a time by the feet, and dragging it by a sudden jerk under the surface, he fastens it to his girdle, and thus loads himself with as many as he can carry away, without creating the least alarm or disturbance among the rest."

ORIGIN of the CHARACTER of SHYLOCK.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

I KNOW not whether the following may be considered a proper subject for the Sporting Magazine, but as it is curious, and serves to illustrate one of the favourite pieces of our immortal bard, I think you may venture (without offence to your numerous readers) giving it a place in your next Number.

Sept. 4, 1794.

IT appears beyond a doubt, that the scene between Antonio, in the Merchant of Venice, and the Jew, is borrowed from a story in the life of Pope Sextus V. of which the following is a relation.

It was reported at Rome, that Drake had taken and plundered St Domingo, and carried off an immense b oty; this account came in a private letter to Paul Secchi, a very considerable merchant in that city, whose concerns in the island were immense, and on which he had made considerable insurances. Upon receiving the news, he sent for the insurer, Sampson Cenda, a jew, and acquainted him with it; the jew, whose interest it was to have such a report disbelieved, gave many reasons why it could not be possibly true; and at last, worked himself up in such a passion, that he said, "I'll lay you a pound of my flesh it is a lie." Secchi, who was of a choleric disposition, replied, "I'll lay you a thousand crowns against a pound of your flesh, it is true." The jew accepted the wager, and articles were immediately executed between them, that if Secchi won, he should cut the flesh from whatever part of the jew's body he pleased, with a sharp knife: the truth of this account being soon after confirmed, the jew was almost distracted, when he was told that Secchi had solemnly sworn he would compel him to the literal performance of his contract. A report of the transaction was brought to the Pope, who sent for the parties, and being informed of the whole affair, said, "When contracts are made, it is just they should be fulfill d, as we intend this shall; take a knife, therefore, Secchi, and cut a pound of flesh from any part of the jew's body you please; we would advise you, however, to be very careful, for if you cut but a scruple more or less than your due, you shall certainly be hanged." The result ſult at laſt was, that, to deter others from laying ſuch wagers, they were both ſent to priſon, and condemned to ſuffer death; this ſentence was changed for the galleys, with liberty to buy off that too, by paying each of them 2000 crowns, to be applied to the uſe of an hoſpital the pope had lately founded.—The only difference that I can perceive between the two is, in changing the perſons, by ſubſtituting the jew for the chriſtian.

Poaching Defined.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine,

Gentlemen,

I MUCH admire the letter which made its appearance in your laſt Number, under the ſignature of a Norfolk Farmer, and thinking the following, which was conveyed through the channel of a reſpectable monthly publication, many years back, not only analogous, but extremely intereſting at the commencement of the hunting ſeaſon, I entertain little doubt but you will give it a place in your uſeful Miſcellany.

I am, &c.

Sept. 1, 1794. W. W.

As the nature of poaching is not ſo generally; nor perhaps ſo perfectly underſtood, as I think it ought to be, for the peace and quiet of mankind, I beg to be indulged a few words upon that ſubject.

I define this noble art to be the deſtroying of all the game we can, to the hindrance of every body elſe. The former part of this definition, 'tis preſumed, will be diſputed by none; therefore I ſhall only obſerve upon it, that it matters not by what means the ſaid game is killed, whether in a fair or an unfair way, whether by a qualified or unqualified perſon; for my lord who with his dogs puts to death 3 or 4 brace of hares in a morning, and would do it every day if he could, and has his game-keeper ready with his gun, if a pheaſant or woodcock ſprings, to be ſent after them, is as great a murderer of the game as the erranteſt poacher in the eye of the law.

The other member of the definition, to the hindrance of every body elſe, is in my opinion, the very eſſence of the art; for what does the common poacher do, but take all the game to himſelf to the excluſion of all others; and in effect, that there ſhall be none for any body elſe to purſue? There is no occaſion to enquire here, on what motive this is done, whether the ſame be a lucrative or a pleaſurable one! Since ſo long as the game is entirely engroſſed by one perſon, actuated by a reſolution of deſtroying all he poſſibly can, there is an endeavour to aſſume all to ourſelves, to the excluſion of others, which is poaching. If any one doubts of this part of the definition, let him only conſider with what ſevere menaces, with what rancour, malice and tyranny, with what ruinous and cruel proſecution, this affair of excluſion is promoted, by the Nimrods and Sylvans of the age. And therefore if there be any noblemen, knights, eſquires, or qualified gentlemen, of this excluding temper, I deſire they would take notice that they are to all intents and purpoſes poachers, and are diſtinguiſhable only from the common herd, in that they are poachers according to law.

The occaſion of theſe obſervations are owing to a deadly feud lately raiſed in my neighbourhood; of which being no ſportſman myſelf, I have been a diſintereſted obſerver.

Old Mr. Acton is of a robuſt and vigorous conſtitution, and both loves and underſtands a peak of dogs. He is keen for his age, rides well, and has often hunted with Roper. Mr. Diddle, a young gentleman of large demeſnes in his neighbourhood, is of too tender and delicate a conſtitution to bear the cold rude breath of the morning, and too weakly to endure the fatigue of a chaſe; but nevertheleſs, miſtaking his talent, which is better adapted to the drawing-room, he has thought fit out of mere vanity and folly, to have all the expence and parade of a complete pack of harriers: and accordingly has ſent Mr. Acton word, with certain very ungentleman-like threats and inſinuations, to keep out of his liberties; for which I can diſcern no other reaſon, but that Mr. Diddle may have all the game to himſelf, and his huntſman who is at preſent a mighty favourite of his maſter's, the pleaſure of killing it. However, this, Sir, has broken all peace and good neighbourhood amongſt us and hatred immortal, for ſo I muſt call it, ſince no one knows when it will end, is commenced between theſe two gentlemen; and as there are tyrants of many ſorts, military tyrants, civil tyrants, &c. I can look upon Mr. Diddle in no other light than that of a poaching tyrant, or as compared with the underlings of the trade, as a tyrant poacher, I conſider him, ſir, as a mighty peſt of ſociety, and a great diſturber of its peace; and as our laws no doubt are defective in many points, I muſt think they are moſt egregiouſly ſo in this, whilſt, inſtead of providing a remedy againſt this ſpecies of tyranny, they contribute, as they now ſtand, to the ſupport and encouragement thereof. But what remedy, you'l ſay, can be had? The following, as to hares and hare-hunting, might be thought ſufficient. Let it be enacted,

1. That no dogs go to the field without their maſter.

2. That all grounds be free; upon a preſumption, that common ſenſe and common civility will keep gentlemen from approaching too near one another's manſions, and each other's beat.

3. That it be highly penal to kill above one brace of hares in any one day.

Theſe regulations, few as they are, I humbly conceive, would effectually, not only remove all heart burnings and cauſes of quarrels amongſt neighbours, but alſo contribute at the ſame time, to preſerve and increaſe that ſpecies of game.

Account of the IGUANA, or what is more commonly called the GUANA, a creature found in moſt of the Iſlands in the WINDWARD PASSAGE, and the Manner of Hunting them by the Ancient Indians; extracted from Mr. BRYAN EDWARDS's Hiſtory of the WEST INDIES.

THIS animal is a ſpecies of the lizard, and is generally about three feet long, and proportionably bulky, it lives chiefly among fruit trees, and is perfectly gentle and innoxious; Europeans doubtleſs learnt to make food of them, from the example of the ancient Indians, amongſt whom the the practice of hunting them was a favourite diverſion. I believe it ſeldom happened that they were ſerved at any Engliſh table, but their French and Spaniſh neighbours, leſs ſqueamiſh, ſtill devour them with exquiſite reliſh. I imagine too they have good reaſon; for I have been aſſured by a lady of great beauty and elegance, who ſpoke from experience, that the iguana is equal in flavour and wholeſomneſs to the fineſt green turtle.

In a note, Mr. Edwards has extracted from Father Labat, an account of the manner of catching this animal, which we give in his own words:

"We were attended (ſays he) by a negro, who carried a long rod, at one end of which was a piece of whip-cord with a running knot: after beating the buſhes ſome time, the negro diſcovered our game baſking in the ſun, on a dry limb of a tree; hereupon he began whiſtling with all his might, to which the iguana was wonderfully attentive, ſtretching out his head, and turning his neck, as if to enjoy it more fully. The negro now approached, ſtill whiſtling, and advancing his rod gently, began tickling with the end of it the ſides and throat of the guana, who ſeemed mightily pleaſed with the operation; for he turned on his back, and ſtretched himſelf out like a cat before a fire, and at length fairly fell aſleep; which the negro perceiving, dexterouſly ſlipt the nooſe over his head, and with a jerk brought him to the ground. And good ſport it afforded (continues the reverend hiſtorian) to ſee the creature ſwell like a turkey cock, at finding himſelf entrapped.—We caught others in the ſame way, and kept one of them alive ſeven or eight days, but it grieved me to the heart, that he thereby loſt much delicious fat."

Theſe animals are likewiſe known in the Eaſt Indies; Sir Joſeph Banks ſhot one of them at Batavia, and found it good food.

In one of the Papers called the World, the following Story is related of a Duel which happened in the preſence of CHARLES V. of France, between a Dog and a Man.

A GENTLEMAN of the court was ſuppoſed to have murdered another, who had been miſſing ſome days. This ſuſpicion aroſe from the mute teſtimony of the abſent perſon's dog, a large Iriſh greyhound, who, with uncommon rage, attacked this ſuppoſed murderer wherever he met him. As he was a gentleman, and a man of very nice honour, (though, by the way, he really had murdered the man) he could not bear laying under ſo diſhonourable a ſuſpicion, and therefore applied to the king for leave to juſtify his innocence. The king being a great lover of juſtice, granted his requeſt, and ordered the liſts to be made ready, appointed the time, and named the weapons. The gentleman was to have an offenſive club in his hand, the dog a defenſive tub to reſort to occaſionally. The Iriſh greyhound willingly met his fair inviter at the time appointed.—They fought, the dog prevailed, and almoſt killed the honourable gentleman, who had then the honour to confeſs his guilt, and of being hanged for it in a few days.

Scheme for improving the Breed of JOCKEYS.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

MY chief inducement in writing to you at this time, is to desire you will use your endeavours to bring the jockey into equal esteem with the animal he bestrides, and to beg that you would promote the settling an established scheme for the preservation of his breed. In order to this, I would humbly propose, that a stud for the jockeys should be immediately built near the stables at Newmarket, and that their genealogies should be duly registered: that the breed should be crossed, as occasion might require; and that the best horsemen, and of lightest weights, should intermarry with the full sisters of those who had won most plates; and, in a word, the same methods used for the improvement of the jockies, as their horses. I have here sent you the exact pedigree of a famous jockey, taken with all the care just now prescribed, and I doubt not, if my scheme was universally put in execution, that we should excel all other nations in our horsemen, as we already do in our horses.

TO RIDE THIS SEASON.

An able jockey, fit to start for match, sweepstakes, or King's-Plate; well sized, can mount twelve stone, or strip to a feather; is found wind and limb, and free from blemish. He was got by Yorkshire Tom, out of a full sister to Deptford Nan; his dam was got by the noted Matchem Tims; his grand dam was a German Princess, and his great grand dam was Flanders Moll; his sire won the King's Plate at York and Hambleton, the ladies subscription purse at Nottingham, the give and take at Lincoln, and the sweepstakes at Newmarket. His grand sire beat Dick Rogers at Epsom and Burford, and Patrick Mac Cut'em, over the Curragh of Kildare.—His great grandsire, and great great grandsire, rode for King Charles II. and so noble is the blood that flows in this jockey's veins, that none of his family were ever distanced, stood above five feet five, or weighed more than twelve stone.

Of the FALLOW HOUNDES, and their Nature.

(Concluded from Page 266.)

I HAVE redde none other thing of the antiquitie of fallow houndes, but onely that I have seen in an olde written booke, made by an hunter, the whiche maketh mention of a lorde of Brytayne, called Hüett of Nantes, and the authorve of that booke, did muche esteeme hunting; the whiche, amongst other things, gave this blazon to the houndes of that lorde's kennel:

Huett, thy fallow houndes in forestes hunt apace,
And kill at force, harte, hinde, buck, doe, foxe, hare, and every chace.
As those thy selfe haste eke, above all others prayse,
To hollow well in hollow woodes, unto thy houndes alwayes.

Also I have seen in a chronicle, in the towne of Lambale, a chapter whiche maketh mention that a lorde of the sayde place, with a kennel of fallow and redde houndes houndes did rouſe a ſtagge in a foreſte of the countie of Poicticre, and did hunte and purſue him for the ſpace of four dayes, in ſuch ſorte, that the fourth day he took him neare to the citie of Paris; and it is to be preſumed that the fallow houndes are the ancient houndes of the dukes and lordes of Brytaine, of the which the Lorde Admirall d'Aneybauld and his predeceſſours have alwayes keepte and mayntained the race, the which came firſt to be common in the tyme of the greate king Frances, father of hunters. Theſe fallow houndes be hardie, and of good ſcent, keeping very well their chaſe, without change, and are almoſt of the complexion that the whyte houndes are, ſaving that they do not endure the heate ſo well, nor yet the preaſe or thronge of the prickers and gallopers, but they are ſwifter, more univerſall for all chaſes, and hotter in hunting, and if it chance that a beaſt do ſtray out in the champaigne, or in the fields, they do never lightly forſake the chaſe. Their complexion is ſtrong, for they feare neither the colde nor the waters, and they runne ſurely, and are verie hardie; they are faire hunters, loving commonly the harte, better than any other kinde of chace, and they are more opinionate, and harder to be taught than the whyte houndes, and ſo are they able to endure greater payne and travel. The beſt that you ſhall finde of the race of theſe fallow houndes, are thoſe which have theire heare moſte lively redde, and ſuche as have a whyte ſpotte in theyre forehead, or a ring aboute theyre necke, and likewiſe thoſe which are altogether fallow: but thoſe that be lighter yellow, or being marked or ſpotted with blacke or dunne, are not greatly to be eſteemed: thoſe whiche are well jointed and dewclawd, are beſte to make blood houndes: and there are ſome whiche have theire tayles ſhagged like eares of corne, and thoſe are commonly good and ſwift; and ſince princes at theſe days have mingled the races of fallow houndes, one with the other, therefore they are become much ſtronger and better for the harte, the which is the beſt chaſe to yield pleaſure unto kings and princes, but ſuch houndes are not meete for meane gentlemen, becauſe they are commonly but for one chace: and they paſſe not greatly for the hare and other ſmall chaſes; and again they are muche inclyned to runne at tame beaſtes.

Of the Nature and Complexion of Dunne Houndes.

Our Dunne houndes are ſuche as anciently our kynges of Fraunce and Dukes of Alençon did moſte eſteeme; they be common, becauſe they are fitte for moſt chaſes, and therefore they be fitteſt for gentlemen; for theyre nature and complexion is ſuche, that the hunte all kynde of chaces which you would have them hunte. The beſt of the race are ſuche as be dunne on the back, having their fore quarters redd or tanned, and the legs of the ſame coloure, as it were, the coloure of a hare's leg. Sometimes you ſhall ſee ſome that have theire hayre on the top of theire backes dunne, or almoſt blacke, the whych do ſometymes prove excellent; and although there are not maney badde houndes of this ſorte to be ſeene, yet nevertheleſſe, the light dunne houndes having their legges fallowe after a very ticke colour, are ſeldom ſo ſtronge ſtronge or ſwifte as the others are, and princes cannot ſo much delighte in them for ſundrye cauſes. One cauſe is, for that they doe muche feare the thronge of the hunteſmen, and they are troubled with theyre noyſe; for as muche as they are hotte, and of a greate courage, and put themſelves quickley out of breath, hearing the crye and noiſe of the hunters. Another cauſe is, that they feare heate, and doe not greatly eſteeme a chace whiche doubleth or turneth before them: but if the chace holde endlonge, you ſhall hardely finde better or ſwifter houndes, although they be very opinionate, harde to beleeve theyre huntſmen, and verie eaſilie inclined to change, becauſe of their heate and follie, and becauſe of the greate compaſſes whyche they caſte when they are at defaulte; and, above all thinges, they ſticke muche upon knowledge of theyr maſter, and eſpecially his voyce and his horne, and will do more for him than for aney other hunteſman. They have ſuche emulation amongſte themſelves, that they know the voyce of their followers, and whether they be ſure or not, for if they be babblers and liars they will not lightley follow them. They be houndes of greate travell, fearing neither colde nor water, and if they feel a chace to ſinke once before them, and that they begin to be ſpent, then will they never forſake it untyll they have kylled it. They whiche will take pleaſure in them, muſte uſe them in this ſort; at the firſt uncoupling of them, they muſte follow and encourage them as temperately as maye be, and with verie littel noyſe, for that they be hotte and do quickely overſhoote the tracke or path of the chace which they undertake, and therefore the hunteſmen on horſe backe ought not over haſtily to follow them, untill they undertake it endlonge: nor likewiſe, ought they not to come over haſtely unto them at a default, and they muſt likewiſe beware that they croſſe them not, for feare leaſt they make them turne backe upon them, and ſo in this manner they may take pleaſure in them.

Of the Blacke Houndes, anciently come from St. Hubert's Abbey, in Ardene.

The houndes which we call Sainte Hubert's, are commonly all blacke, yet neverthleſſe, their race is ſo mingled at theſe dayes, that we finde them of all coloures. Theſe are the houndes which the abbots of St. Hubert have alwayes kept ſome of their race or kynde, in honour and remembrance of the Saint Euſtace, whereupon we may conjecture, that (by the Grace of God) all good huntſmen ſhall follow them into paradiſe.

To returne unto my former purpoſe, this kynde of dogges hath bin diſperſed through the countries of Hennault, Lorayne, Flanders and Burgoney; they are mighty of body, neverthleſſe their legges are low and ſhorte; likewyſe they are not ſo ſwyfte, although they be very good of ſent, hunting chaces that are farre ſtraggled, fearing neither water nor colde, and do more covert chaces that ſmell, as foxes, bores, and ſuch like, than any other; becauſe they finde themſelves neyther of ſwiftneſ nor courage to hunte they kille the chaces that are lighter and ſwifter. The bloodhoundes of this coloure, proove good good, especially those that are cole blacke, but I make no greate accompte to breede on them, or to keep the kynde; and yet I founde once a book, which a hunter did dedicate to a prince of Lorayne, which seemed to love hunting, wherein was a blazone, which the same hunter gave to his blood hounde, called Soygllarde, which was white.

My name came firste from holy Hubert's race,
Soygllarde my sire, a hounde of singular grace.

Whereupon we may presume, that some of the kynde prove whyte sometimes, but they are not of the kynde of the greffyers or bauxes, whych we have at these days.

Wild Horses, and the manner of Hunting them by the Kalmucks and Tartars.

In the open tracts near Borrowsk, a town 100 wersts from Woronesch, are herds of wild horses, which are hunted by the inhabitants; M. Gmelin, who was present at a chase of these animals, gives the following account of them:

" The largest of these wild horses are scarcely the size of the smallest Russian horses; their head is remarkably large in proportion, their ears are very sharp, sometimes the size of those of a tame horse, and sometimes elongated so as to resemble those of an ass. Their mane is very short and curled; their tail more or less covered with hairs, but always a little shorter than that of a common horse; they are of a mouse colour which is the characteristic mark of the wild horses, in this country, though that of others has been said to be whitish, or ash grey; their hairs are very long, and so thick as to feel like a pellisse, rather than a horse's hide. They run with the greatest speed, at least double that of a good domesticated horse; they take alarm at the least noise, and fly off in an instant. Each herd has always a stallion for its leader, who marches at their head, and they never leave him; if he be stricken down, all the rest disband, and become an easy prey to the hunters. They are generally fond of keeping near the hay-stacks which the peasants build in the Steppe, but they are not seen to lye on the ground any where; they eat the hay with much voracity, and become round with fat; the stallion is greatly attached to the Russian mare, and does not fail to entice her with him to the desert whenever he can; hence there are often horses of a bastard race among the herds, and many mares are lost, to the great detriment of the peasants. Wild horses taken alive, which is never done without nooses of rope, are very difficult to tame and rear to labour—it is absolutely impracticable to mount them—when harnessed they move very heavily by the side of another horse, and they generally die in the second year of their captivity."

Analogy of the Fox and Place Hunter.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

IT is with no small degree of satisfaction, that I have read the very judicious and pleasing remarks remarks of your correſpondent Acastus, on the noble and manly exerciſe of fox-hunting; ſome time ago, when I had no enjoyment for it myſelf, I was too apt to entertain but an indifferent opinion of the fox hunting ſquires in my neighbourhood; but now, from my own obſervations I can prove that what is called a mere fox-hunter, is in this diverſion as ſenſible a man as a mere courtier, who, with all the hurry, eagerneſs, and importance of ſtate, is following a game much more contemptible than that of the country ſquire. In the court, as in the field, all have the ſame object in view, every one ſtrives to be foremoſt, and hotly purſues what he ſeldom overtakes; and if he does, it is, when ſeriouſly conſidered, of no great value. He that is beſt horſ'd, that is beſt friended, gets in ſooneſt, and then all he has to do, is to laugh at them that are behind. He may be juſtly ſaid to be in view, who is in favour; and he that has a ſtrong faction againſt him, hunts upon a cold ſcent, and may in time come to a loſs.

In the ſtate chaſe, as in that of the fox, one rides upon full ſpeed a great way about, while another, taking ſome by indirect way, leaps a ditch, or makes a gap, and comes in before him. Another ſpurs on till he flounders into a quagmire; that is, follows the court till he has ſpent all, and there he is ſure to ſtick, without any attempts being made to help him out, but rather, every one that paſſes will laugh at him for a bad horſeman. Some hunt without ever ſeeing their game; ſome follow the premier, and never ſee the place or penſion; others ſpur a horſe till he is tired, and theſe are they who importune a friend till he is weary of them. To conclude the contraſt between court and country hunting, they who are the keeneſt ſportſmen and deepeſt ſtateſmen, have always their neck in the greateſt danger.—Believe me, gentlemen, I am an admirer of your work, and ſhould this trifle be deemed worthy a place in it, I may be induced to trouble you again.

To know the Age of a Horse by his Teeth.

THE annexed plate, deſcriptive of the horſe's teeth, and by which the age of that animal may be known with the greateſt accuracy, was taken from a print in the poſſeſſion of a nobleman, whoſe equeſtrian knowledge, the public have been acquainted with long ſince; and we flatter ourſelves, will be deemed no improper appendage to our Treatiſe on Farriery. We ſhall ſubjoin a few neceſſary directions by way of illuſtration, which we hope will be ſatisfactory to our readers.

Till he is eight years old, the age of a horſe may be known by his teeth; about which time they commonly turn in without any black mark: if it remains after that age, without hollowneſs, then the horſe has ſtill the mark in his mouth, which he will retain in all probability as long as he lives. In ſuch a caſe his tuſks will ſhew his age, which, if long, and the top rounded, he is nine years old. At about eleven or twelve he begins to wink or twinkle with his eyes. The teeth falling every other year are marked thus ọ.

ANECDOTE of his late Royal Highneſs the PRINCE of WALES.

HIS Royal Highneſs was many years reſident at Cleifden Houſe, in the county of Bucks, and being very fond of ſhooting, he gave orders for breeding a great number of pheaſants and partridges, that, when they came to proper maturity, they might be liberated, on purpoſe to afford his Royal Highneſs amuſement in the ſhooting ſeaſon: by this means the neighbouring woods and fields were moſt plentifully ſtored with game.

It happened a clergyman, whoſe name was Bracegirdle, reſided in the neighbourhood with a large family, upon a ſmall curacy, and being an excellent ſhot, thought there was no harm in leſſening the number of game towards the ſupport of himſelf and his family: the Prince being appriſed of it, ſent an expreſs command to him not to deſtroy the game, for that he would, in due time, conſider him and his family. The mandate was punctually obeyed at that time, the parſon laid by his gun, and every thing ſeemingly promiſed no further encroachments.

The enſuing ſeaſon, his Royal Highneſs being out on a ſhooting party in the neighbourhood, heard the report of a gun at no great diſtance from him; orders were immediately given to find out the party, and bring them before his Royal Highneſs: — Who ſhould approach but Parſon Bracegirdle, and being come in the preſence, the Prince (with his uſual good-nature) aſked him what diverſion he had met with; to which he replied, ſome little: but pray, ſaid the Prince, what have you got in your hawking bag?—let us ſee the contents. The parſon then drew out a fine cock pheaſant, and two brace of partridges. Very fine, ſaid the Prince, but did not I command you not to deſtroy the game? The parſon, very ſenſible of the breach he had been guilty of, moſt humbly beſought his Royal Highneſs's forgiveneſs; alledging that the beauty of the morning invited him abroad, and happening to take the gun along with him, the creature, (pointing to the game) got up before me, and fleſh and blood could not forbear.—The Prince was ſo pleaſed with his apology, that he bid him riſe up and attend him; the converſation then turned on the art of ſhooting flying, which at that time his Royal Highneſs was rather defective in, but by Mr. Bracegirdle's conſtant attendance on the Prince in all his ſhooting excurſions, he became a tolerable good ſhot; and in remembrance of the promiſe he made him, obtained for him the living of Taplow, then worth two hundred pounds a year.

VERITAS.

Cheſter,
Sept. 2d, 1794.

THE FEAST OF WIT; OR SPORTSMAN's HALL.

IT was a whimsical, if not a just remark, which was made by a sporting gentleman, on reading the account of the late catastrophe of Robespierre and his party, in the French Convention:—"Mark the end of it, says he, they are fighting a Welch main among themselves, and they'll not give up the conflict while there are two cocks left in the pit to peck at one another."

The following advertisement is copied from a Dublin paper:—"To be let for as long term of years as they will last, Mr. O'Connor's house and concerns on the Batchelor's Walk; in staunch repair, and within a few yards walk of the bridge," &c.

An officer lately on the continent, remarkable for his avaricious disposition, and severity to his men, was near being drowned, by accidentally falling into a river in their march from Antwerp.—Several of the men passed on without endeavouring to save him; at length a grenadier plunged in, and brought him on shore, for which he was rewarded with sixpence. The want of generosity on this occasion, was a new cause of reproach from the soldiers, to which the grenadier archly replied, "Comrades, why should you blame him? he is unquestionably the best judge of the real value of his own life."

A Quaker, meeting a young lady in the present fashion of dress, or rather of nakedness, asked her, "Whether that lamb was to be sold?" and on her angrily replying "No!" rejoined: "Why, then, my pretty friend, dost thou put it on the shambles."

A few days ago, an honest Hibernian, having unfortunately had his sloop seized at a port in the West of England, was advised by somebody to apply to a magistrate, who might be of service to him. He accordingly made the application, and had proceeded in accounting for his putting to sea without the proper certificates, when the magistrate asked him, "Can you swear?"—"O yes,—(replied the captain, whose eagerness would not permit his worship to finish the sentence) "by J—s, sir, if swearing will save my Sally, I will not lose her."

The

The military manœuvres of the Dutch, in the laſt campaign, may be collected from the following anecdote: — The death of an officer was lamented in a numerous company. "It was his own fault," obſerved a brother officer; "his avarice was the cauſe of his death — five pounds would have ſaved his life. He wanted a horſe; I offered him one at 25l. — he bought another for 20l. Had he not been ſo ſparing, my horſe would have enabled him to eſcape ſwiftly and effectually from the purſuit of the enemy.

BON MOT.

An honeſt Criſpin of the city of Cheſter, in converſation with a tradeſman on the ſubject of that bank, very gravely told the latter, that "the buſineſs in it was all done between Roger Edwards and him!"—The elucidation of which ſimply was, that Roger, an honeſt publican, lives on one ſide of the bank, and criſpin on the other; ergo, the buſineſs was done between them.—This is not diſſimilar to the Iriſh centinel, who, doing duty up to the Treaſury wall, ſaid he "ſupported the Treaſury."

A ſeaman of the Southampton packet, hearing the paſſengers below deck rather boiſterouſly loud, hallooed down the companion— "By G—d I won't ſuffer this, for I have the King's mails on board." He was anſwered, "No! why then you muſt fling his females overboard."

AMERICAN MILITARY TOAST.

The Militia of this State.—May the call of our country beat the reveille to every generous paſſion of our boſom; and the tatto to thoſe which are ſelfiſh. On our march through life, may we never forſake the ſtandard of freedom and republicaniſm: and at the evening of our days, when Death ſhall call his ſolemn roll, may an unabated love for our country appear firſt on the muſter, and the ſign for its happineſs be the evening gun of our lives.

The following curious hand-bill, has been lately circulated about Edinburgh:

"Thou ſhalt not ſteal."

"All perſons whom it may concern are deſired to take notice, that ſteel traps of the largeſt ſize, for catching breakers of the eighth commandment, are every night placed in the garden of St. Bernard, between Stockbridge and the Water of Leith, on the north ſide of the ſaid water; that ſpring guns are ſet, to rake the walls with ſhot, upon the touch of a wire; and that a tent, having in it an armed watchman, is pitched in the middle, with orders to fire without mercy. If, therefore, any evil-diſpoſed perſon or perſons, ſhall attempt to break into the grounds of St. Bernard, their blood be on their own heads.— AMEN!

"Of fruit of the garden thou ſhalt not eat—for in the day that thou eateſt thereof, thou ſhalt ſurely die." GEN. xi. 17.

To prove that the religious fanatics of the preſent age are as fooliſh, if not as malevolent as the political ones, a certain popular preacher, in the neighbourhood of Hull, expreſſed himſelf to this effect in one of his late ſermons→ "My friends, if you neglect the opportunities which you enjoy under my miniſtry, there is no doubt but your damnation will be ten-fold! At the great day of judgment, the Almighty will addreſs address me in this wise"—"Mr.—, have you preached the Gospel to these people?"—"Yes, Sir, but they would not hear me." "Would not they? then send them to the hottest place in hell!"

An odd circumstance occurred a few days ago in the New Forest: As some gentlemen were riding near Brockenhurst, they saw the hinder part of an ass hanging over the wall of a pound, and were for some minutes lost in conjecture, as to the meaning and nature of the accident, until the other parts, such as the head and forelegs, made their appearance, when the passive animal fell into the highway. Before it had sufficiently recovered to stand upright, two sailors crept over the wall, when the gentlemen made enquiry into the business, and were thus bluntly and humanely answered by the sons of the wave: "Why, looke, master, we saw this here animal aground without victuals d'ye see, and so my messmate and I agreed to cut his cable, and give him his liberty, because we have known, before now, what it is to be at short allowance!"

BON MOT.

In a cause of trespass, tried at Newcastle, Mr. Law, in behalf of his client, observed, that he would prophesy the business on which he was engaged would soon be decided. Mr. Chambre, on the opposite side contended, that his learned friend must certainly be mistaken; that the trial had already lasted six hours, and from the variety of evidence yet to bring forward, there was a probability of it continuing six hours longer; "but," added he, "it is hard to dispute against both Law and the Prophet."

CURIOUS LAW CASE.

A gentleman of the parish of Horningshead, near Bury, was drawn for a militia-man. He went to Bury, and hired a substitute. When the man, going to be attested, was asked how many children he had; he replied, "one at home with my wife, and three in the church-yard." The magistrate concluded that the three were dead and buried, and accordingly swore in the substitute, who immediately joined his regiment. It afterwards turned out that he had four children living, three of whom he sent into the church-yard to play whilst he was attested. The question at issue is, whether the above parish ought to pay the town of Bury for the maintenance of a wife and one child, or three children?

THE BAILIFF OUTWITTED.

A few days ago, the corpse of a gentleman, as it was proceeding in a hearse to the burial ground, was arrested by a sheriff's officer and his followers, under a warrant, as usual, granted against the body.

The friends who followed, immediately left their coaches, and told the officer, if he chose, he was welcome to the body, but he should neither have coffin, shroud, nor any one particle in which the body was enveloped: and if he took them by force, he should be indicted for a highway robbery, as those matters were the property of the executors: nay, they went further, and said, that as the deceased had, by his will, bequeathed his body to the executors, no execution would hold good good against the corpse, the process must be against them.

The bailiff, very properly, being persuaded that the spirit of the law meant a living, and not a dead body, marched off, without insisting on the legality of his capture.

This is the first instance of the kind that has happened, since the arrest of the dead body of a sheriff of London, not many years since.

An action was lately commenced by a bailiff against an attorney, for a Libel upon the character of the former; but the matter was happily settled by the interposition of a thief-taker, who acted as the common friend of both parties.

Four gentlemen of the shoulder lately set off from the town of Bolton, in Lancashire, on a secret expedition against a certain Boniface at Bury. On their arrival, the landlord (having a few hours before settled the demand) produced a bill and receipt, which he presented to their wondering eyes. The honest quartetto, expressing their astonishment rather in a tone of disappointment, induced the host to offer them a tankard of beer, and a shilling each, which, in a jocular strain, he said was given "in the King's name."—But, alas! — the catchpoles were caught in their turn; for it turned out, that the Bury landlord had got a beating-order: so that, instead of being arrested himself, he arrested the whole covey, — at least till they paid smart.

The sermon preached at the consecration of the military colours in St. Ann's church, Manchester, was from the 20th chapter of Deuteronomy, and first verse:— "When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses and chariots, and a people more than thou, be thou not afraid of them, for the Lord thy God is with thee."—Might not the words of Shakespeare's Venetian Merchant, Anthonio, in his remark on the Jew's scriptural quotation, for the justification of an usurious contract, be well applied here? — "The d—l can cite Scripture for this purpose!"

LADIES PADS.

Various are the mistakes that have arisen from the use of this term: but that of a countryman, some months ago, was, perhaps, the most fatal in its consequences. He was going to London, and, amongst a number of friendly commissions which he was desired to execute, was one from a female acquaintance, who lived with the Lady Bountiful of the village, and for whom honest Hodge had a sneaking kindness. It was written on a scrap of paper, and requested him "to purchase a LADY'S PAD, (of a MODERATE size) in Tavistock street."—Hodge, never suspecting that this same pad was to be carried upon a lady's belly; but supposing it was a nice little animal intended to carry a lady on its back, (by the assistance of a friend as unlearned in these matters as himself) found the way to Tattersall's, where, to speak the truth of him, he bought a very handsome pony, of a moderate size. Hodge returned into the country, riding upon his plough-horse, and leading the pony, often congratulating himself on the choice he had made, which, he had the happiness to find, was hugely approved of by the ostlers and stable-boys at every stage. — "No more of of your lofty looks, Miſtreſs Suſan, (quoth Hodge, as he jogged along,) I think I may now fairly look for ſmiles and approbation on a bargain that has ſtood the teſt of ſo many judges." — Thus did Hodge ruminate till the moment in which he met the idol of his wiſhes. But no language can deſcribe the ſurprize and diſappointment which took poſſeſſion of both the parties. My Lady's cabinet was drawn upon, to prevent hyſterics! — Hodge ſtared as if bereft of his ſenſes! — But the moſt tragical part of the ſtory is yet to relate. — The good Old Lady inſiſted upon knowing the meaning of this uproar; and ſhe was no ſooner informed of the miſtake, than ſhe diſcharged Suſan for—indelicacy.

THE following addreſs, which appeared in the Bath and ſeveral other of the country papers, in conſequence of the facetious JACK COLLINS commencing the buſineſs of an auctioneer in that city, we think entitled to the notice of our readers, and therefore ſhall make no further apology for its inſertion at this time.

JOHN COLLINS, author of the Evening Bruſh, having, for ſeveral years paſt, made the buſineſs of an auctioneer his peculiar ſtudy, ſo as to acquire a competent knowledge of the juſt and ſpecific value of property, under every denomination whatſoever, from a landed eſtate to a lock of wool, from a manſion houſe to a hen coop, and from a coach and ſix to a coral and bells; reſpectfully announces to the public, that by the univerſal advice of his friends (his late purſuit in life requiring ſuch exertions as are injurious to his health and conſtitution) he quits the comic ſcene, wherein he has often rubbed away the ruſt of care, to mount the appraiſer's pulpit, where the hammer, of courſe, will ſuperſede the bruſh, and the advertiſer hopes, however aukwardly he may handle it at firſt, that, like the reſt of the fraternity, he ſhall ſoon find the way "To hit the right nail on the head with it. Therefore, if any perſon or perſons are poſſeſſed of more land than they wiſh to monopolize, more houſes than eligible tenants, more books than they have leiſure to read, more pictures than they have rooms to hang them in, more houſhold furniture than they can poſſibly find uſe for, or more ſtock in trade than they have cuſtomers to take off their hands;—He will endeavour to rid them of all ſuch incumbrances, by a few fair comments on their intrinſic worth, and a due deſcant on their reſpective claims to the title of a good bargain; without violating his own veracity, or giving cauſe to the purchaſer to ſay he has been impoſed upon. In ſhort, to ſum up his profeſſional views in a few words, whoever will do him the honour to become his employers, they ſhall find that integrity, punctuality, and diſpatch, particularly in the grand article of SETTLING ALL ACCOUNTS without the LEAST DELAY, are the rules of conduct to which he will rigidly adhere, till the hammer of DEATH is uplifted to knock him down for a LOT OF HIS OWN, and his brother auctioneers ſhall exclaim, with ſympathiſing ſorrow, Alas, Poor COLLINS! A GOING! A GOING! A GOING!

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

ON Saturday evening the 31st of August, as two gentlemen were returning from Keswick to Cockermouth in a post-chaise and pair, one of the horses (which was young, and not sufficiently broken) took fright at the top of Lorton Brow, where the road lies almost upon the edge of a precipice, several yards in height, and nearly perpendicular, and against which there is no fence but a low hedge or wall. The unruly animal, dragging his companion, took a sudden leap over the hedge: providentially for the passengers, the violent dashing of the carriage against the hedge broke the harness; and, not less fortunately for the driver, who happened at the time to be sitting upon the springs.— The carriage was of course left upon the road, and the passengers and driver received no other injury but from the shock and the consternation natural to so terrifying a circumstance. The horses rolled down to the bottom of the precipice, entangled in the harness. The spirited horse, which occasioned the mischief, beat upon his feet, and sustained no hurt; the other fell upon his back, and died in a few minutes.

FIRST OF SEPTEMBER.

Yesterday, numerous detachments of Sporting Cocknies marched out before day-break, by statutable authority, and, according to annual custom, waged war against all the poultry race within the purlieus of the metropolis! All the preceding day, being Sunday, was devoted to the pious work of collecting curs, ponies, guns, powder-horns, flints, shot, bags, touch-hole prickers, and other implements of destruction, for this universal warfare. The young ladies of Cheapside, were busily employed in cutting paper to hang at their brothers button-holes.

Several of the most determined shots, who have been on service before, slept on their arms the night preceding, that they might not be caught napping by their more vigilant associates: — the cow-keepers and little farmers in the neighbourhoods of Hackney, Islington, Clapham, &c. very prudently drove in all their pigs and poultry, to prevent their falling into the power of the common enemy! The platoon-firing commenced with the dawn of day, through the free-warren of Lambeth-marsh and Cold-bath-fields, when the whole line round the suburbs went to it pell-mell, keeping a running fight till broad noon day, when the fire slackened, and the dextrous riflemen, flushed with victory, marched into cantonments in the circumjacent public houses!

We are sorry to hear that some old women were frightened to death, under the stale idea of a French invasion. Those who had little children to spare, very parentally sent them out early to pick flowers in the fields, as the surest means of having them provided for.

Sept. 1, was run for, over Flidwick Flat, near Ampthill, in Bedfordshire, a whip, given by the gentlemen of the Ampthill Hunt, added to a Sweepstakes, by hunters carrying 12st. each, one 4-mile heat, and was won by Mr. Harwood's br. h. Tantivy, beating Mr. Seaver's b. m. Amelia, Mr. King's b. h. Poppet, and Mr. Walsham's gr. h. Ruffian.—This race, upon which considerable bets were depending, was well contested, and won with difficulty. We hear the above whip will be run for annually, the first week in September, by horses belonging to gentlemen of the Ampthill hunt.

Sept. 11, on Hackney Downs, was decided the pigeon-shooting-match for ten guineas, Messrs. Hoole and White against Messrs. Tomlin and Littleton, at ten pigeons, which was lost by the latter gentlemen, the adverse side killing every bird. The sport afforded entertainment to a genteel company. Among the number of good shots present, were Mr. Vernor, Mr. Bottomley, Mr. Childs, &c. &c.

John Ward and William Treble, two well-known pugilists, returning to town a few nights since, in a chaise cart, were stopped near Acton, by a single highwayman, who demanded their money; and notwithstanding Ward told him who they were, the robber still persisted in his demand, saying, he paid no respect to personages, and obliged those two mighty heroes to deliver the contents of their pockets, which amounted, on the part of Ward, to half a crown and some halfpence, and on that of Treble, to one guinea and a silver watch. They had proceeded a very little way farther, when they were attacked by three footpads, who, on being informed they had just been spoke to, permitted them to go on.

The Doctor Grigsbys, of the metropolis, have not been very fortunate in their sporting perambulations; except a few geese and a fine he ass, belonging to a man in the neighbourhood of Ratcliffe-highway, no other game has been sprung between the Tower and Limehouse; not one partridge has been seen, even among the ruins of the late fire.

Lately, a compleat set of changes was rung at Winslow, Bucks, by a set of ringers who have not been together since the year 1755. One was abroad in the years 1759 and 1760, under the Prince Ferdinand; another has been absent many years; the assistant to the tenor was likewise with them. Many gentlemen went to see these veterans exhibit. They are, one with another, about 59 years of age.

At the late Machynlleth races, the 50l. purse was won by Dr. Evans's horse I'm Quick, beating Mr. Lloyd's ch. m. Stop till I come, and Mr. Vincent Evans's horse I'm done for.

PONEY RACE AT NORTHAMPTON DURING THE RACES.

Mr. Odell's black poney Kitty, beat Mr. Benton's bay poney, Te-totum, at two 4-mile heats.—This was a most extraordinary performance; for the highest of them (the black poney) is only 13 hands 2½ inches, and the other barely 13 hands; they ran the first four miles, carrying 14 stone each, in twelve minutes; and the second, (which was allowed to be a most capital heat) in thirteen minutes and a half. And though the odds before starting the last time were 8 and 10 to 1 in favour of the black poney, she won but by about half a length. The winner has been in constant meat for two years; the other had been but three weeks from grass.

The

The covies of partridges are more numerous this feafon than has been remembered for many preceding years, and the birds are already in full ftrength, owing to the uncommon drynefs of the weather at the time of hatching; but the nides of young pheafants, it is feared, will be much injured by the late heavy rains.

The ftables of the Margrave of Anfpach have at this time, at his villa near St. Albans, four fcore of the fineft Englifh hunters this country can produce his Highnefs keeps this immenfe ftud merely for parade, having feldom, if ever, mounted a fingle horfe fince his refidence in England.

A young nobleman, recently enlarged from his confinement in the King's Bench Prifon, paid a vifit fhortly after to a celebrated houfe in St. James's Street, out of which he came minus feventeen thoufand pounds.

The equeftrian promenade of the Turkifh Ambaffador's fuite is from the Circus Turnpike to Blackfriars Bridge, and back again, on fine days. They ride on the great Turkifh faddle, and at a pace of about a mile an hour with pipes in their mouths. The heads of their horfes, which are beautiful ftallions, are ornamented with crimfon taffels, and the ftirrup, covered with Morocco leather, is large enough for a cradle for a child in the month.

A few days ago, a pure Effex virgin, in her 75th, year, actually died in a fit of the utmoft anguifh and defpair, for the lofs of her inconftant lover, a thoughtlefs roving youth of 60, who, it appears, had given preference to, and even joined hands with her niece, another, pure, blooming virgin of about his own age.

MARRIAGE EXTRAORDINARY.

A few days ago, at Richmond in Yorkfhire, a maiden lady, aged 67, to a young gentleman aged 22; majority on the fide of the tender fair one, 45.—The gentleman had feveral thoufand fubftantial reafons for this ftep.

THE ESSEX SPORTSMAN.

A game-keeper and ranger, not 100 miles from Terling, laft month, in bufhing fome fields for the prefervation of game, they by chance fell upon the flot of a deer, after two days and a half hard traverfing, for thirty miles round the country, floted him into a field belonging to a Mr. Ely, and after collecting a number of idle hands, they befet the field around, and brufhing the fame, to their mortification and aftonifhment out brufhed an aged old ram, which left the deluded fportfmen to retire without their prey.

GAME LAWS.

The following inftance of oppreffion and injuftice attending the remains of the Feudal Syftem may be relied on.

A farmer renting a freehold had the misfortune to kill a hare upon his own grounds! The lord of the manor, inftead of being contented with the punifhment of levying the penalty of 5l. which he might have done before a juftice, was cruel enough to bring an action againft him, in which the farmer was caft. He was afterwards taken in execution for debt and cofts, amounting to the enormous fum of 140l. and thrown into the King's Bench Prifon, where he lay upwards of 11 years;

11 years; and was only released by the operation of the late insolvent act ! ! !

An English lady of fashion, dressed in the present state, is, literally speaking, no-body; and strange to tell, the full grown Misses, naturally prone, as we might suppose, to matrimony, seem determined not to have any-body. It is presumed, however, that this determination will not last long, and that, by next winter, at farthest, they will have some-body.

Amongst the prudent papas, the favourite toast at this time is, "The present fashion of our wives and daughters, viz. No waste."

The dupe who keeps a blue chariot and equipage for his mistress, is the scoff and ridicule of all the dashing blades at the west end of the town. The lady uses no hypocrisy in her infidelity, as before her stupid paramour, she invites every day some son of Mars, from the fruit shops or gambling houses in Pall-Mall, or St. James's Street, to a jaunt in her lover's carriage.

Mrs. Esten has been delivered of a boy at Gordon Castle; when the express with this happy intelligence was set off from Scotland to Duke-street coffee-house, Edinburgh was not illuminated.

An unfortunate accident happened at Ludlow, the last race-day: A son of Mr. Lewis Cooper, a fine youth about ten years of age, being on horseback, the animal accidentally took fright, threw him, and fractured his skull in a most shocking manner; He was trepanned in three places, by Mr. Williams, and there are now very great hopes he will recover.

In the list of persons guillotined at Paris on the 23d ult. under the direction of Robespierre, we find the name of T. Ward, a native of Dublin, ex-general of brigade in the army of the north. This gentleman was well known in the sporting circles in England, by the name of Captain Ward.

Some weeks ago, a dog belonging to a person of Wetheral, near Carlisle, went mad, and bit his horse, for which, after some delay, the owner procured some of the medicine usually prescribed to such animals. This proved ineffectual; for the person having occasion to go to Carlisle on Saturday the 16th instant, his wife, (in preparing the horse for his journey) received a bite on the breast from the animal. Notwithstanding this, the man rode his horse to Carlisle, and turned it loose in an inn-keeper's stable, amongst a great number of other horses; the consequence of which was, that several of them were bit; pads, saddles, &c. torn; and it is greatly feared, that most, if not all, the horses in the stable were bit.—The hostler was amazed at the unruliness of the horse, and though he did not suspect the cause was at length induced to confine him. The owner, finishing his business, ordered his horse, and returned homewards; when the poor animal labouring under that dreadful disease, pushed forward in such an unusual manner, as to convince his rider at last, that he was really mad. The animal was shot the next morning.

SHOOTING.

CANTO II.

THE PARAPHARNALIA.

COME now ye hardy youths, who wiſh to ſave,
By ſportive labour, powers that Nature gave;
Fly—fly from langour, huſh'd in dread repoſe,
Beneath the leaves of Sloth's enchanting roſe,
Glad on the upland brow, or echoing vale,
To drink new vigour from the morning gale!——
Come!—and the Muſe ſhall ſhew you how to foil,
By ſports or ſkill, the tedious hours of toil;
The healthful leſſons of the FIELD impart,
And careful teach the rudiments of Art.

When the laſt ſun of Auguſt's fiery reign,
Now bathes his radiant forehead in the main,
The panoply, by ſportive heroes worn,
Be rang'd in order for the enſuing morn;
Forth from the ſummer guard of bolt and lock,
Comes the thick guetre and the fuſtian frock;
With curious ſkill the deathful tube is made,
Clean as the fuzee of the ſpruce parade;
Yet let no poliſh of the ſportſman's gun,
Flaſh like the ſoldier's weapon to the ſun,
Or the bright ſteel's refulgent glare preſume
To penetrate the peaceful foreſt's gloom;
Let the cloſe pouch the wadded tow contain,
The leaden pellets and the nitred grain;
And wiſely cautious, with preventive care,
Be the ſpare flint and ready turnſkrew there!
While the ſlung net is open to receive
Each prize the labour of the day ſhall give.
Yet oft th' experienced SHOOTER will deride
This quaint exactneſs of faſtidious pride;
In ſome old coat, that whilom charm'd the eye,
Till time had worn it into ſlovenry,
With dusky weapon, all by ruſt conceal'd,
Thro' rainy ſervice in the ſportive field,
He iſſues to the plain, ſecure to kill,
And founds his glory on ſuperior ſkill.

CANTO III.

PARTRIDGE.

THE night recedes, and mild AURORA now
Waves her gay banner on the eaſtern brow,
Light float the miſty vapours o'er the ſky,
And dim the blaze of Phœbus' glariſh eye;
The flitting breeze juſt ſtirs the reſtling brake,
And curls the cryſtal ſurface of the lake:
Th' expectant ſportſmen, urg'd by anxious haſte,
Snatch the refreſhment of a ſhort repaſt:
Their weapons ſeize, their pointers call around,
And ſally forth impatient to the ground
——Here, where the yellow wheat away is drawn,
And the thick ſtubble clothes the ruſſet lawn,
Begin the ſport—eager and unconfined,
As when bold Æolus unchains the wind.
The active pointer from his thong unbound,
Impatient daſhes o'er the dewy ground,
With glowing eye and adulating tail,
Ranges the fields and ſnuffs the tainted gale;
Yet, 'midſt his ardour, ſtill his maſter fears,
And the reſtraining whiſtle careful hears.
See how exact they try the ſtubble o'er,
Quarter the field and every turn explore
—Now ſudden wheel, and now attentive ſeize
The known advantage of th' oppoſing breeze.
—At once they ſtop!---Lo, CARLO now deſcries
Where cloſe and near the lurking covey lies.
His caution mark, leſt e'en a breath betray
Th' impending danger to his timid prey;

In

In various attitudes around him ſtand,
Silent and motionleſs th' attending band!
—Now, by the glowing cheek, and heaving breaſt,
Is expectation's ſanguine wiſh expreſt.
Ah, curb your headlong ardour, nor refuſe,
Patient, to hear the precepts of the Muſe.
Sooner ſhall noiſy heat, in raſh diſpute,
The reas'ning calm of placid ſenſe confute;
Sooner the headlong rout's miſguided rage,
With the firm phalanx equal combat wage,
Than the warm youth, whom anxious hopes inflame,
Purſue the fleeting mark with ſteady aim.
By temperate thought your glowing paſſions cool,
And bow the ſwelling heart to reaſon's rule;
Elſe, when the whirling pinion, as it flies,
Alarms your ſtartled ear and dazzled eyes:
Unguided by the cautious aim of care,
Your random bolts ſhall waſte their force in air.

CANTO IV.

THE PARTRIDGE, CONCLUDED.

THE COVEY riſe! ah, yet your fire reſtrain,
Till th' maz'd bird ſecurer diſtance gain;
For, thrown too cloſe, the ſhots your hopes elude,
Wide of your aim, and innocent of blood:
But mark with careful eye their leſs'ning flight,
Your ready gun obedient to your ſight,
And at the length where frequent trials ſhow
Your fatal weapon gives the ſureſt blow,
Draw quick, yet ſteady care with quickneſs join,
Leſt the ſhock'd barrel deviate from the line:
So ſhall ſucceſs your ardent wiſh repay,
And ſure deſtruction wait the flying prey!
As glory more than gain allures the brave
To dare the combat loud, and louder wave,
So the ambition of the Sportſman lies,
More in the certain ſhot than bleeding prize:
While poachers, mindful of the feſtal hour,
Among the covey random ſlaughter pour,
And as their numbers preſs the crimſon ground,
Regardleſs reck not of the ſecret wound,
Which, borne away, the wretched victims lie,
'Midſt ſilent ſhades, to languiſh and to die.
O let your breaſt ſuch ſelfiſh views diſclaim,
And ſcorn the triumph of a caſual aim;
Nor urg'd by rapine, but of honor proud
One object ſingle from the ſcattering crowd,
So when you ſee the deſtin'd quarry down,
Shall juſt applauſe your ſkilful labour crown.
If your ſtaunch dogs require no inſtant toil
To reſcue from their jaws the flutt'ring ſpoil,
Reload your fatal piece with prudent zeal,
While glows with recent flame the ſmoaking ſteel,
So the black grain ſhall kindling warmth acquire,
And take the flinty ſpark with readier fire;
Or, if ſome ſcatter'd bird, that lay behind,
Sudden ſhould riſe, and fleet away on wind,
You check her rapid courſe, nor murm'ring ſtand,
Your empty weapon uſeleſs in your hand.
—Now ſome obſervant eye has mark'd their flight,
And ſeen diſpers'd the wearied covey light;
Soon to the ſpot, the ranging pointer drawn,
Explores with tender noſe, the tainted lawn,
Where to his nicer ſenſe the fumes betray
The ſecret ambuſh of the fearful prey;
With cautious action now, and ſtealthful pace,
His careful ſteps purſue the running race:
Now fix'd he ſtands—now moves with doubtful tread,
Stop'd by their pauſe, or by their motion led,
Till, rooted by the ſhelt'ring hedge, his feet
Declare the trembling victims laſt retreat!
But as with beating breaſts on either ſide,
Th' impatient youths the pleaſing taſk divide,
And in the row, between the lurking game,
Lies hid from ſight, ah, careful be the aim!
Leſt ſcreen'd and parted by the thorny mound,
The erring ſhots ſhould give a fatal wound,
And change the jocund Sportſman's verdant wreath
For fun'ral weeds, for mourning, tears, and death.

TRIGGER.

THE EWE-BUGHTS.

I.

"WILL you go to the Ewe-bughts, Marian,
"And wear in the ſheep wi' me?
"The mavis ſings ſweetly, my Marian,
"But not ſae ſweetly as thee."
Theſe aft were the words of my Sandy,
As we met in the bow of the glen,
But nae mair ſhall I meet wi' my Sandy,
For Sandy to Flanders is gane.

II.

How can the trumpet's loud clarion
Thus take a' the ſhepherds afar?
Oh, could na' the Ewe-bughts & Marian Pleaſe mair than the horrors of war?
But, oh, 'tis the fault o'them aw, ſirs,
In ſearch of gowd and of fame,
The lads daily wander awa', ſirs,
And leave their poor laſſes at hame.

III.

Not a plough in the land has been ganging,
The owſen hae ſtood i' the ſta',
Nae flails in our barns hae been banging;
For mair than this towmond or twa.
Ilka laird in the Highlands is rueing,
That he drove his poor tenants away,
For naething is ſeen here but ruin,
As the haughs are aw lying in lay.

IV.

There's gowd in the garters of Sandy,
And ſilk in his blue bonnet lug,
And I'm not a kaerd nor a randy,
Nor a laſs without blanket or rug:
Then why ſhould he fight fae for riches,
Or ſeek for a ſoger's degree,
Or fling by his kilt for the breeches,
And leave the dear Ewe-bughts and me?

THE PIEDMONTESE.

BY MRS. RADCLIFFE.

AH! merry ſwain, who laugh'd along the vales,
And with gay pipe erſt made the mountains ring,
Why leave your cot, your woods, and thymy gales,
And friends belov'd, for aught that wealth can bring?
He goes to wake o'er moonlight ſeas the ſtring—
Venetian gold his untaught fancy hails;
Yet oft of home his ſimple carols ſing;
And his ſteps pauſe, as the laſt Alp he ſcales.
Once more he turns to view his native ſcene:— [away,
Far, far below, as roll the clouds
He ſpies his cabin 'mid the pine tops green,
The well-known woods, clear brooks, and paſtures gay;
And thinks of friends and parents left behind,
Of ſylvan revels, dance, and feſtive ſong:
And hears the faint reed ſwelling in the wind;
And his ſad ſighs the diſtant notes prolong.

Thus went the ſwain, till mountains ſhadows fell,
And dimm'd the landſcape to his aching ſight;
And muſt he leave the vales he loves ſo well?
Can foreign wealth and ſhows his heart delight?

No, happy vales! your wild rocks ſtill ſhall hear
His pipe light ſounding on the morning breeze;
Still ſhall he lead the flocks to ſtreamlets clear,
And watch at eve beneath the weſtern trees.

Away, Venetian gold!---your charm is o'er;
And now his ſwift ſtep ſeeks the lowland bowr's,
Where, thro' the leaves, his cottage light once more
Guides him to happy friends and jocund hours.

Ah, merry ſwains, that laugh along the vales,
And with gay pipe now make the mountain's ring—
Your cots, your woods, your thymy ſcented gales,
And friends beloved---more joy than wealth can bring.

TO A ROSE.

FRAGRANT child of vernal ſhow'r,
I woo thee meekly bluſhing flow'r!
Bent 'neath the dews that fall from high,
How ſweet thou ſmileſt to mine eye!
Yet ah! perhaps, 'ere evening's cloſe,
Some hand might pluck thee, thou ſoft roſe!
Thee on ſome virgin's breaſt might doom
To waſte away thy rich perfume,
Where envious, thy faint leaves ſhall pine,
For beauties lovelier far than thine!

ON BENJAMIN BRADLEY, LATE TEA DEALER IN THE STRAND.

CONGENIAL with this clay lies old
Ben Bradley,
Whose merry tales were always told—so sadly—
The end—when end they had—his friends heard gladly,
Yet wish'd they not the end of honest
Bradley.

A NEW CASE,

FOR THE OPINION OF THE JUDGES.

FOR most offences there's a law,
And punishment attends,
But here, methinks, I see a flaw,
On which there much depends.

Chloe, a nymph of high renown,
At church, at play, and court,
With charms unrivall'd thro' the town,
Makes stealing hearts her sport.

Then make, I pray, ye judges kind,
A law to try the theft,
As soon, I fear, the men will find Themselves of hearts bereft.

Quoth Buller, with his usual wit,
"However hard the case is,
"No jury can be found so fit
"As Muses and the Graces."

If so, my lord, I greatly fear
In vain the case is stated;
For well you know, from all I hear,
The parties are related.

INSCRIPTION,

On a Seat at Whiston in Pembrokeshire, which stood exposed to the Sun.

FORM'D to attend on silence, shade,
and ease,
Where the luxurious indolent might doze;
Where love, unheard, might urge its tend'rest pleas——
And languid beauty shelter to repose.

How long must I remain, by fate severe,
My founder's pious purposes to foil?
Thus misapplied, unceasingly to bear
The martyr-plaints of those I'm doom'd to broil!
Hence to some spot, kind friend to his design!
Quick snatch me from this torrid
zone away,
Where, taught by Nature, am'rous
boughs entwine,
A love-inspiring-umbrage to display!

Dispos'd to suffer morning's earliest beam,
Mild as it is, not glaring to intrude;
Partial alike, to catch day's farewell
gleam,
But tyrant Noon entirely to exclude.

So shall the mistress of this lov'd retreat
The spot with her angelic presence grace---
Her heart's fond master following to the seat,
The soul of Virtue in her charms to trace.

So shall this spot be sacred to the joy,
Which only such as love like them
can know---
A bliss (if such on earth) without alloy---
The bliss of Eden prior to its woe!

ON MICHAEL CHURCHMAN, LATE MASTER OF THE TUN TAVERN, ST. JAMES'S MARKET.

WHATE'ER thy haste, pause, passenger! and learn
A useful lesson from this humble urn.
The lov'd remains of Churchman here
repose, [disclose
Whose worth plain truth's adapted to
Hard was his lot the various tastes to hit
Of Placeman---Sportsman---Tradesman---
Player---wit---
Of 'Squire and pugilist! yet with won-
'drous ease,
Their diff'rent humours he'd the art to

With prudence, patience, perseverance fraught,
Th' eccentric manners of his guests he caught.
A scholar in the highest class he's fam'd:
That folio vast---the world, his study

Endow'd with that rare jewel---common
He knew to value shillings, pounds,
and pence; [friend,
Yet with a lib'ral hand he'd serve a
And in convivial hours delight t'unbend.
Nature and Fortune, oft at variance found
By counteraction great designs confound:
Else temper, conduct, and a judgment clear
Had plac'd him in a more exalted sphere.
Still all rejoic'd, while, like a minor sun,
He gladden'd, night and day, the jovial
Tun;
Where each frequenter now laments
the man,
Whose zeal to please reduc'd life half its span!
Reader! in running life's precarious race,
Let love of health and wealth keep equal pace
